The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North said most appropriately that a distinction should be drawn between nuclear power and nuclear waste, because it is within the knowledge of all of us that successive Governments have supported nuclear power. In fact, it was the former Secretary of State, Bruce Millan, who gave approval for Torness to be built under the electric lighting Act. Therefore, we all—certainly the members of the major parties—have a moral obligation to make absolutely certain that nuclear waste is dealt with in the safest possible way and in a way that gives the greatest reassurance to the public.

I agree entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and other hon. Members that there must be as much openness as possible on this subject. That is why, in the last Parliament, I sought to discuss on the Consolidated Fund with the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) the subject of nuclear power.

One point which I feel that I should answer concerns the planning implications. If Nirex were to decide that either Sellafield or Dounreay would be suitable as a repository for nuclear waste, planning permission would be required. The Government have made it clear that, if such an application were made, it would be called in for decision by the relevant Secretary of State and a full public local inquiry would be held. Scottish National Heritage, as the Secretary of State's adviser, would be asked for its views. Any proposals and objections that it might make would be fully considered at the inquiry. The planning framework is well established and capable of dealing with contentious cases. No special legislative provision is necessary.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) made a courageous speech. He made absolutely clear his support for the trade unionists who are most engaged in safety procedures. The hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) rightly suggested that the safest method possible should be used, and that I wholeheartedly support. I am sure that Nirex will take careful account of what the hon. Members have said.

Mr. Home Robertson: I thank the Minister for confirming that a planning application would be called in and would be covered by a full public inquiry. Can he confirm that similar planning arrangements would apply to the establishment of a dry store for nuclear fuel waste at Hunterston, Torness, and so on?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Member takes me a stage further on. I can confirm that that subject is now under consideration. The hon. Member made a speech about spent fuel. Spent fuel which is not radioactive waste is currently sent to Sellafield for reprocessing. Dounreay is involved in reprocessing smaller quantitites of reactor fuel. Recently, however, Scottish Nuclear Ltd. put forward proposals to store spent fuel on site at Torness and Hunterston rather than send it to Sellafield. These proposals are currently under consideration. However, I shall be very happy to correspond further with the hon. Gentleman if he wants me to follow up any details in relation to spent fuel. If hon. Members wish, I can tell them how different forms of waste are dealt with.

Mr. Darling: Is the Minister saying that Scottish Nuclear has abandoned its plans to take spent fuel by rail, through Edinburgh, to Sellafield, and is considering keeping it on site? If that is what he is saying, it seems to be a departure from the position that the Government have taken up to now. The people of Edinburgh, as well as people elsewhere, will want to know.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I did not say that, but I shall make inquiries and write fully to the hon. Gentleman.

I was asked by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North about the Secretary of State's decision on Nirex's application to drill 6,000 boreholes. Nirex appealed to the Secretary of State against the regional council's decision to refuse approval. The Secretary of State will announce shortly the decision and the outcome of the appeal.

I was asked about the views of NCCS and SNH. Obviously, it is for NCCS to express its own view; it is not for the Government to speak on its behalf.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow and the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) asked me about submarine hulks. No decision has yet been taken on the most appropriate means of disposing of out-of-service nuclear submarines. Currently, when a submarine has finished its active live, it is defueled, the radioactive material is removed for storage, and the submarine is beached at secure moorings. The disposal of the residual radioactive components of such submarines is now under active consideration.

Mr. Dalyell: This matter was raised nine years ago. It has been considered for a long time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall certainly draw the hon. Gentleman's comments to the attention of the Secretary of State for Defence, who clearly is involved in these matters.

I was asked about expenditure on research into the long-term disposal of radioactive waste. In 1990-91 the Department of the Environment spent about £9 million on such research. Details are given in the annual report of the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee. In 1990-91, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food also spent £3·5 million, and the industry itself spent about £27·5 million. The total of £40 million shows the seriousness with which this problem is rightly treated.

New clause 1 seeks to give to Scottish Natural Heritage new functions which, in our view, are inappopriate. The purpose of SNH is to combine the functions of the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland and the Countryside Commission for Scotland—not to cross the work of the pollution control agencies. The hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) was a member of the Standing Committee that considered the Environmental Protection Bill in 1990. That legislation introduces tighter controls over possible sources of pollution, but uses the expertise of the existing regulatory authorities, which, with regard to nuclear substances, are the nuclear installations inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive and Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

Part I of the 1990 Act established a new system of control over the most potentially polluting processes that do not involve emissions of radioactivity. This will be administered by the industrial pollution inspectorate and the river purification authorities. Part II introduces tighter controls over the disposal of non-radioactive wastes. These will be exercised by the waste regulation authorities, overseen by the hazardous waste inspectorate of the Scottish Office. Part V of the 1990 Act strengthens the Radioactive Substances Act 1960, which is the statutory framework within which the industrial pollution inspectorate controls the keeping and use of radioactive material and the disposal of radioactive waste.

I do not recall that during the passage of that legislation the hon. Member for Angus, East expressed any dissatisfaction about this matter. It really is not good enough for him to suggest that it should be dealt with in the context of this Bill. Everybody knows that Scottish Natural Heritage is much more concerned with soft green issues. The Standing Committee of which the hon. Gentleman was a member dealt with hard green issues. He had every opportunity on that occasion to raise the matter if he was dissatisfied.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: Is the Minister saying that the new agency will have no say whatsoever if it is proposed that a nuclear dump be located at Dounreay? He says that SNH has the right to advise the Secretary of State, but has no legal right to be consulted or to take action. In refusing to rule out nuclear dumping in Caithness, is the Minister a Scottish Office NIMBY, like his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, or a Scottish Office namby?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: New clause 1 seeks to give Scottish Natural Heritage statutory power in relation to any development of an underground repository for radioactive waste that may be proposed for Scotland. I am glad to see that the new clause leaves the final word with the Secretary of State. In effect, therefore, it merely requires the Secretary of State to consult Scottish Natural Heritage before allowing the development of any underground repository. For a very simple reason, that is unnecessary.

I am very happy to give an undertaking that, if there is any proposal to develop an underground repository, the Secretary of State will make certain that Scottish Natural Heritage is notified and given the opportunity to express its views. It will be free to express its views to my right hon. Friend directly, or at the local planning inquiry, to which we have already committed ourselves, if Nirex proposes that the United Kingdom's underground repository should be located at Dounreay. That commitment dates from 1984.

I want to refer to a point that is of particular importance and is relevant to a matter raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow. Nirex has made it clear that, other factors being equal, Sellafield—not Dounreay—will be the preferred site because of transport considerations. It would simply be much cheaper to site the repository near Sellafield, where most of the waste arises. Of course, this gives rise to the question of transportation, about which I want to speak briefly, although it comes within the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Dalyell: Some of Nirex's friends, of whom I am one, are rather exasperated. Why should Opposition Members and their constituents be stirred up if the Government have more or less made up their minds—rightly, I believe—that Sellafield should be the location? I am told that the geological conditions there are very favourable. Why on earth should all this trouble be caused gratuitously? The Government's friends begged them not to take this course. They did it once in Ayrshire, and now they are doing it again.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Nirex will take careful note of what the hon. Gentleman has said, and will bear in mind the fact that he is a very strong supporter of nuclear power and of the most stringent safety conditions.

The question of transportation was raised—in particular, by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling).

Mr. Kennedy: Hon. Members have made the point that Nirex is not a free-standing agency, that it has a degree of accountability to Ministers. The Minister may draw the remarks of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) to the attention of Nirex, but can he explain what the Government were thinking of when they decided to drill in Caithness? By strong implication, we are now being told that Sellafield has been the preferred option all along, and is beginning to look as if it was the more likely option all along.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman must appreciate that, if various parts of Britain have nuclear power, the best and safest means of disposing of waste must be employed.

I have been asked what contact there has been between Secretaries of State and Nirex in the past. To answer that question, I shall have to check in great detail the minutes of all the appropriate meetings, and I shall be happy to do so.

The matter raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow should be well within the knowledge of Nirex, which would be wise to take it fully into account.

The issue of the transportation of nuclear waste is really a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. This Bill is not an appropriate vehicle for discussion of the issue. However, I can say that the safety record in the transportation of nuclear material in this country is excellent. The safety regulations for the transporting of such material are based on stringent internationally agreed standards, laid down by the International Atomic Energy Agency. This question has been considered several times in recent years—at the Dounreay, Sizewell and Hinkley public inquiries—and in no case did anyone produce evidence that cast doubt on the adequacy of the regulations.

In nearly 30 years of nuclear flask movements, not one incident has occurred that led to the release of even the smallest quantity of radioactivity. The transport of nuclear waste to a deep repository, wherever it is ultimately sited, would of course be considered in detail at the local planning inquiry to which we have committed ourselves.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): Nuclear submarines and reactors are extremely large objects to decommission. How feasible does the Minister think it would be to have such constructions taken to Dounreay? In other words, Dounreay seems to be ruled out from the start.

6.30 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am not putting forward any such proposal tonight. I can only tell the hon. Gentleman that the matter is under consideration. If he has a proposal to make, I strongly suggest that he sends it to the Secretary of State for Defence, with a copy to the Scottish Office.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow had my total agreement when he said that it was inappropriate to use the expression "nuclear dump". It is extraordinary to find that phrase being used so much when most of the radioactive waste that is produced in Scotland is transported into England for disposal or reprocessing. It is perhaps a commentary on the extremes to which scaremongering has extended that some people believe blatant untruths. It should be borne in mind that 50 per cent. of Scotland's electricity is supplied by nuclear energy.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) spoke about reprocessing. There is an important distinction between reprocessing fuel from abroad—in which case the waste will eventually be returned to the country of origin—and the disposal of radioactive waste created in this country. Dounreay's reprocessing business, which has safely and successfully been carried out in the past, has nothing to do with Nirex's current geological investigations at Sellafield and Dounreay, which are to determine whether either would be a suitable site for a deep repository for United Kingdom waste.

To sum up, the new clause seeks to give SNH statutory power over the development of an underground repository for radioactive waste. In doing so, the new clause cuts across the existing statutory framework in the Radioactive Substances Act 1960. The Act contains adequate provisions for controlling the disposal of radioactive waste. The authorisation procedures for disposing of radioactive waste require consultation with appropriate bodies. I assure the House that SNH would be included in any such consultations.

I hope that, with those reassurances, Opposition Members will not think it necessary to press the clause to a Division.

Mr. Wilson: I said at the outset that I was pleased that we had managed to get this issue raised on the Floor of the House. At the end of the debate, I am even more pleased, for this has been a first-class debate, which has proved extremely useful. Remarkable about it is the fact that we have achieved great consensus on the issue, beyond the immediate subject under discussion, of whether a repository should be established at Dounreay.

I cannot say that this will prove to have been an influential debate, but it should be. The Official Report of it should be read in the proper circles, because the unanimity among the parties—hon. Members speaking from different standpoints but arriving at the same conclusion—is impressive. The consensus is clearly against the development at Dounreay. My hon. Friends and I are grateful to the Chair for allowing the debate to range wider than the immediate subject of the new clause.

There have been some key contributions to the debate. Much of what the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said was common sense, although he said that there had been some hysterically anti-nuclear speeches from the Opposition Benches. A characteristic of the speeches of Opposition Members, certainly of Labour Members, has been the strong support for the civil nuclear industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) and I have major nuclear installations in our constituencies, as have my hon. Friends the Members for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey), whose views have been changed somewhat. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) recalled visiting Chapelcross during the 1987 election and giving assurances that there was no threat to that station during its commercial lifetime.

In other words, the hon. Member for Dumfries must not lump all his past opponents together in the way he did. Any hon. Member who represents a constituency which includes an establishment such as Hunterston has his or her mind fully concentrated on the need for nuclear power and the contribution that it makes to the wider Scottish economy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow was right to ask whether it is necessary to stir up a hornets' nest over the issue. The Secretary of State has been told that he more than anyone should recognise the unnecessary storm that will be created if he allows the matter to proceed further. He must be aware of the way in which it could develop into an enormous issue. It is not in his interests, or in those of Scotland or the community most directly affected, to allow it to be at the centre of the brouhaha that would develop particularly if at the end of the day it turned out to be a false start, either because there was no interest in Dounreay or because it was discovered, after the expenditure of £500 million, that the place was not geologically suitable.

The Secretary of State has power quickly to bring the whole matter to an end. We were told by the Under-Secretary that he would be deciding soon on the 6,000 test bores. That could be the moment for him to make some virtue of the fact that he will uphold local democracy and say that the Dounreay option will not be pursued further. It is clear, on the basis of tonight's debate, that he would earn the gratitude of hon. Members in all parts of the House, and that would give the clearest possible message to Nirex.

The Under-Secretary said that Nirex would take careful note of what has been said in the debate and particularly of the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow. While Nirex may take careful note of our words, it would take even more careful note if it received a letter from the Secretary of State saying that he was not of a mind to overturn the democratically arrived at planning decision of Scottish National Heritage.

I welcome the comments of the Minister about the role of SNH and I hope that, on this and other issues with which the Bill is concerned, SNH will take heart from the fact that it seems to be the will of the Government that it should become involved in contentious matters in a wholehearted way. In other words, SNH does not exist simply to discuss the birds and the bees and peat cutting and the minutiae of nature conservation issues. It must get involved, from an environmental point of view, in the big issues of Scottish life and politics.

Having said that, I fear that I must tell the Minister that he did not go far enough, and that we feel it necessary to press the matter to a Division to reinforce the arguments that we have adduced.

I should have referred in my opening remarks to the fact that, when representatives of Highland regional council came to the House yesterday, they stressed strongly the commitment that Caithness had given to the nuclear industry. Caithness is also in the eye of the storm in conservation matters. Instead of proposals from Nirex to take up the slack in the Caithness economy, Highland regional council would like the Government to say that the scientific research base for SNH will be centred in the place which is relevant to environmental concerns, which has a strong scientific background and which is facing great economic difficulties.

The convenor of Highland region, Duncan McPherson, wrote to the Secretary of State in those terms this week. He concluded his letter by hoping that the Secretary of State would support Highland regional council's desire to have the scientific research base, initially of the Nature Conservancy Council and subsequently of Scottish Natural Heritage, established in its area. What a constructive note we would end on if we could send that message to the people of Caithness and if we could tell them at the same time that the Secretary of State is turning down the application for 6,000 unwanted test bores.

New Clause 4

SNH'S POWERS IN RELATION TO PRIVATE ROADS

'(1) It shall be an offence for any person to construct a private road without first informing SNH of their intention to do so.

(2) Where SNH are of the opinion that the construction of a private road would result in serious damage to the natural heritage they shall serve notice of that fact on the person proposing the construction.

(3) Where such notice has been served, it shall be an offence to commence or to continue the construction of the road without the permission of the Secretary of State sought and obtained in writing.

(4) The Secretary of State shall not give such permission without first consulting SNH.

(5) Any person found guilty of an offence under this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale.

(6) For the purposes of this section "private road" means a road or track not maintained by a roads authority and constructed to bear vehicular traffic, whether or not it is a public right of way, and above a length to be specified by the Secretary of State."—[Mr. Galbraith.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 4 deals with private tracks throughout Scotland and seeks to bring them under planning control.

Anyone who has tramped across the Scottish mountains or driven over them on local authority or other roads cannot help but be disturbed by the scars created on the landscape and to our natural heritage by those roads that clearly spread across the moorland and hills. Those tracks give access to a limited number of individuals but are offensive to a large number of people who see them. They are often unsightly because, being on private land, they come under no planning control.

The clause attempts to bring those roads within the authority of Scottish Natural Heritage. It is a problem that has been with us for many years and is growing rapidly. It has caused great concern to the Countryside Commission for Scotland. Indeed, its 22nd annual report in 1989 says:

"The proliferation of unsightly hill tracks in remote and scenically beautiful areas continues to cause concern".

One of the worst cases mentioned by the Countryside Commission was the track bulldozed through Glen Feshie by Lord Dulverton, who owned that area. It was a particularly beautiful area which many of us, including the Minister—who often takes his holidays there in the winter—have often tramped. That beautiful glen has been scarred, probably irretrievably, by an unsightly track that was bulldozed through it without permission, despite the fact that the Countryside Commission recommended that Highland regional council continue to refuse planning permission and to seek reinstatement. That, however, has not been possible.

There was a further problem in 1986 when a track above 300 m, which is the limit imposed by the commission, was bulldozed through Glen Ey within the Deeside and Lochnagar national scenic area, again without planning permission. Another example is the hill track in Strath Dionard, which lies on the northern margin of the north-west Sutherland national scenic area. Unless action is taken to bring those tracks within planning controls, the problem can only worsen.

We are not attacking landowners, nor are we attempting to prevent tracks on private land within Scotland. Rather, we are trying to ensure that, if such tracks are necessary and a good case can be made for having them, they should at least be developed in a suitably scenic way as far as possible. Many of them lead to no significant place. For example, the track near Arduerike estate, which is three or four miles long, leads only to a small fishing loch. One finds when walking in that area that no one else uses the track. Therefore, those tracks are bulldozed for use by a limited number of individuals, and for most of the year they lie vacant, only to assault the eyes of those who see them.

Another problem is the track at Beinn a'Bhuird, in a particularly nice area. It is badly designed and offensive to the eye. It could easily be dealt with, because it now lies within the Mar Lodge estate.

What is the Government's current position on Mar Lodge estate? Will they make funds available for that estate or will it pass into public ownership? Mar Lodge estate stretches from the woods of Dee, up over Corrie Etchican down Ben McDuie across to Cairn Toul, across to the nature reserve at Glen Feshie. It forms part of an extremely beautiful landscape of great natural heritage significance. It is currently owned privately, and it is said that it could be sold to the public for £10 million to £15 million—a small price to pay for such an exquisite piece of land. If Scotland's natural heritage is to be protected, surely Scottish Natural Heritage should purchase that land on behalf of the nation.

Today's Scotsman said:

"Mar Lodge provides an opportunity for the state to protect and preserve an important part of Scotland's heritage, including three of Britain's highest mountains. Under the new agency it could become a model demonstrating how conservation, recreation and limited development could be practised without conflict. It is estimated that, at the most, such a venture would require £5 million from the Exchequer".

Are the Government prepared to give not only tacit but practical support to Scottish Natural Heritage and purchase Mar Lodge estate for the nation? Were such land in public hands, we could prevent the despoilment of those areas by unsightly tracks. Everyone, whether they tramp across the mountains or merely travel through them, is offended by those roads which, in increasing numbers, are pushed through estates. The amendment seeks to bring them under planning controls to ensure that, if they must exist, they are built in the most aesthetic manner.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Two issues have arisen from the debate: private roads and Mar Lodge.

The prime target of this amendment is the unsightly mountain track, over which there has been some controversy in recent years. The Government agree that there has been a case for extending control over the way in which such developments take place. Since 1987, we have required all proposals for hill tracks in national scenic areas to be subject to planning permission. This requirement for planning permission, which provides for consultation with the countryside Commission for Scotland, and, ultimately, referral to the Secretary of State, will not only be transferred to Scottish Natural Heritage but would also carry forward to apply similarly in natural heritage areas.

We are currently considering whether there is a case for a further extension of this or a similar requirement throughout other parts of Scotland. We intend to seek comments on proposals later this year.

The amendment would create an offence for the construction of a private road without the sanction of SNH. We do not believe that the introduction of a new offence is conducive to the consensual approach we seek for the operation of Scottish Natural Heritage. More particularly, given the existing role of planning authorities, the Countryside Commission for Scotland and, ultimately, the Secretary of State, and the possible extension of the procedures, the introduction of an offence for failing to consult SNH on every private road can scarcely be defined as administratively efficient.

Mr. Wilson: The Minister referred to the consensual approach, but some of the tracks are simply acts of vandalism. Other vandals are not treated in a consensual way, with people saying to them, "Would you mind not doing it?" They are rightly punished for acts of vandalism. Some of the tracks that have been made to pre-empt the controls suggest a level of irresponsibility on the part of those who make them. That irresponsibility will not be constrained by the consensual approach. Perhaps the Minister could give us a firmer proposal.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This is a matter of sufficient importance for me to state that we intend to consult on it, hopefully later this summer, when we shall put forward proposals and listen to various views.

The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) asked about Mar Lodge, which has been in the press a great deal in recent days. The Government recognise the national and international conservation status of the Cairngorms. We have already taken a number of decisions in recognition of their importance. For example, the Secretary of State modified the Highlands regional structure plan to guard against the development of downhill ski developments in Lurcher's gully to protect the gully, surrounding quarries and the adjacent mountain plateau. In that connection, the evidence relating to the road was of particular interest.

We have established a working party under the chairmanship of Magnus Magnusson to develop a management plan for the district, which will form the basis for its protection and sustainable use in the longer term. We also submitted a case for the world heritage listing of the Cairngorms to UNESCO. I am sure that the House will agree that those steps clearly underline our intentions to ensure proper management of the district.

We recognise the important position of the Mar Lodge estate within the Cairngorms. It comprises a range of habitats from the flood plain terraces of the Dee to the high plateau of Ben Macdui. It has significant remnants of the Caledonian Scots pine forest, as well as habitat for a wide range of important bird species. It is also enjoyed for recreational purposes and managed for sporting purposes. The question of who is to own and manage the estate in future cannot be resolved at present, but, as the House will appreciate, for most of Scotland, conservation and recreation management of land is secured through private ownership.

I can assure the House that the Government would be prepared to look at any proposition that might be put to us—although without commitment. I understand that a series of complex discussions are under way at present between a number of organisations. I am afraid that I am not in a position to provide the House with any more detailed information now. I hope that that answers the inquiry of the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden.

Mr. Galbraith: In the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), if I may say so, that was a rather vague statement about what is happening at Mar Lodge. I had hoped that the Minister would come up with a more definite statement and that he might even say that the Government were seriously considering purchasing it for the nation. It is in order to discuss that now, because the Mar Lodge estate includes Beinn a' Bhuird, which contains one of the tracks that has probably caused most controversy and offence over the years.

I was not particularly grateful to the Minister for saying that it would not be administratively efficient to bring all private tracks within the planning procedure. In the immortal words of my hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden, if I may say so, that seems a weak excuse. Anyone who can administer complex schemes, and who attempts to administer the poll tax, will surely find bringing a few private roads under administrative control as nothing in comparison. However, I am grateful to the Minister for saying that he intends to consult and make proposals, which I shall await with great interest, later in the year. Therefore, with the permission of the House, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

SPECIAL POWER OF SNH TO SEEK HABITAT MANAGEMENT ORDERS

'( ) Where it appears to the SNH expedient to do so for the purpose of conserving the natural heritage of Scotland it may make an application to the Secretary of State for a Habitat Management Order for the purposes of carrying out essential nature conservation management; and the provisions of Schedule (Procedure in Connection with Habitat Management Orders) shall have effect as to the making, confirmation and coming into operation of orders under this section.

(2) An application for an order under this section may only be made in respect of land—

(a) which has been notified or meets the criteria for notification as a site of special scientific interest under section 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981; and

(b) has been the subject of an offer of a management agreement with the owners, lessees or occupiers of such land in accordance with the provisions of section 15 of the Countryside Act 1968 (Areas of Special Scientific Interest) and an agreement cannot be concluded.

(3) The Secretary of State may authorise SNH (or any person or organisation which he considers appropriate) to enter the land for the purpose of carrying out any operation necessary to maintain or conserve the special interest of the land.

(4) Any operation authorised under subsection (3) shall be specified in the order applying this section to the land.

(5) SNH, or other person or organisation authorised by the Secretary of State under subsection (3), may give notice to the appropriate owners, lessees or occupiers of the land requiring him to pay the expenses of the operations carried out under the order.

(6) The persons notified under subsection (5) may within 28 days of the services of the notice represent to the Secretary of State that—

(a) the amount specified in the notice is unreasonable; or

(b) the recovery of that amount would cause him hardship, and the Secretary of State shall determine to what extent the representations are justified.

(7) The Secretary of State shall give notice of his determination, the reasons for it and the amount recoverable—

(a) to the persons who made the representation; and

(b) to the authority which gave notice under subsection (5).

(8) Any expenses recoverable by virtue of this section shall be recoverable as a simple contract debt in any court of competent jurisdiction.'.—[Mr. Galbraith.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Galbraith: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this, it will be convenient to take amendment No. 1, a new schedule——

PROCEDURE IN CONNECTION WITH HABITAT MANAGEMENT ORDERS Consultation

1. Before making an order, the Secretary of State shall consult with SNH and such persons as he may consider appropriate.

Giving of Notice

2. (1) Before making an order, the Secretary of State shall prepare a draft of the order and give notice—

(a) stating that he proposes to make the order and the general effect of it; and

(b) specifying the time (not being less than 28 days from the date of the giving of the notice) within which, and the manner in which, representations or objections with respect to the draft order may be made.

(2) Subject to sub-paragraph (3), the notice to be given under sub-paragraph (1) shall be given—

(a) to persons who had received the offer of a management agreement from SNH relating to the operations contained in the order; and

(b) every other owner, lessee or occupier of the land to which the draft order relates.

Unopposed Orders

3. If no representations or objections are duly made to the persons notified, or if any so made are withdrawn, the Secretary of State may make the order with or without modifications.

4. (1) If any representation or objection duly made by persons notified is not withdrawn the Secretary of State shall, before making the order, afford any such person an opportunity of being heard by a person appointed by the Secretary of State for the purpose.

(2) On considering any representations or objections duly made and the report of the person appointed to hear representations or objections the Secretary of State may make the order with or without modifications.

Restrictions on power to make orders with modifications

5. (1) The Secretary of State shall not make an order with modifications so as—

(a) to affect land not affected by the draft order; or

(b) to include operations not authorised in the draft order.

Notice of making of Orders

6. (1) As soon as practicable after an order is made, the Secretary of State shall give notice describing the general effect of the order as made and stating the date on which it took effect.

(2) A notice under sub-paragraph (1) shall be given to the persons notified of the draft order.

Proceedings for Questioning Validity of Orders

7. (1) If any owner, lessee or occupier of the land to which the order applies is aggrieved by an order which has taken effect and desires to question its validity on the ground that it is not within the powers of section (Special powers of SNH to seek habitat management orders) or that any of the requirements of this Schedule have not been complied with in relation to it, he may within 42 days from the date of the giving of the notice under paragraph 6 make an application to the Court under this paragraph.

(2) On any such application the Court may, if satisfied that the order is not within those powers or that the interests of the applicant have been substantially prejudiced by a failure to comply with those requirements make such declaration as seems to the Court to be appropriate.

(3) Except as provided by this paragraph, the validity of an order shall not be questioned in any legal proceedings whatever.

(4) In this paragraph "the Court" means the Court of Session.'.

Mr. Galbraith: The new clause and the new schedule are long and complex but deal with a fairly simple point. A major issue throughout the passage of the Bill, and one which was dealt with extensively in Committee, was sites of special scientific interest and in particular the designation and various appeal procedures involved. However, now we are taking the matter further and considering what happens once a site has been designated.

Some sites of special scientific interest require maintenance or they deteriorate and lose their scientific interest. In its last report, the Nature Conservancy Council detailed such sites. In the year from 1 April 1989 to 31 March 1990, one site was lost—it suffered damage that resulted in the denotification of its SSSI status. In that year, three sites were partially lost—part of the site was denotified—and, in 35 of them, long-term damage occurred—there was a lasting reduction in the special scientific interest of those sites. Overall, 261 sites suffered damage from which they could recover. That shows the scale of the problem. Because SSSIs can deteriorate, some require positive management.

I do not know how many of those sites were in Scotland. The Minister may be able to get the answer to that question swiftly, so I shall talk for a few minutes if he wishes to obtain assistance. How many of the sites that were lost, partially lost or suffered long-term or short-term damage were in Scotland? Classic examples of SSSIs include the chalk downs and Wiltshire downs, where the SSSI sites lose their scientific value unless there is persistent sheep grazing. If the owner no longer wishes to graze sheep there, the area is overcome by scrub and its scientific value is lost.

The new clause would allow Scottish Natural Heritage to restore the designation of an SSSI that is in danger of losing its designation either through neglect or change of purpose of the land. There are two caveats to that. It can be used only on a designated area and where a land management agreement with the owner has been sought. If those two criteria are fulfilled, Scottish Natural Heritage can move in to preserve the sites.

I think that most of the examples are in England. I am not sure whether there are many in Scotland, although there has been a suggestion of one in the outer isles. The important principle set out in the new clause gives Scottish Natural Heritage a power to protect SSSIs that it would not otherwise have. It would be an important extension of the conservation principle in Scotland, and I hope that the Minister will look favourably on the new clause.

Mr. Dalyell: I have two questions of the Minister, and I gave him notice of one of them on Tuesday.

The Carver report strongly recommended that, in the new era, the future of nationally relevant databases and methodologies, such as the national vegetation classification and the biological record centre at Monkswood, should be assured. What steps is Scottish Natural Heritage taking, through the Joint Nature Conservancy Committee or otherwise, to ensure that the landscape and people of Scotland continue to benefit from that expertise? We are not marketing such factors, and we should be holding them in trust. I gave the Scottish Office 48 hours notice so that it could give a considered answer.

Secondly, I think that the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors has been in touch with the Minister's Department this morning. It takes the view:

"With regard to the Minister's statement that 'specified types of development' is not an adequate phrase to include in legislation, the RICS is not convinced that the phrase is sufficiently inadequate as to render the amendment undesirable. The alternative phrase 'such types of development as may be specified by the Secretary of State from time to time' may, however, meet with the approval of the Minister and the Parliamentary Draughtsman and the RICS would be happy to see its proposed amendment reworded accordingly."

At some stage—I think that this is the right one—I should like the Minister to comment on that point.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I welcome the opportunity to debate the role of sites of special scientific interest in habitat protection and the principle upon which the safeguarding of sites is based. The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) has proposed a far-reaching step—in effect, to compel owners and occupiers to pay for the management of their land for nature conservation purposes, determined by the Secretary of State for Scotland in consultation with Scottish Natural Heritage.

While hearings and appeals to the courts are built into the procedures set out in the amendment, and objections to the costs in the new clause, it is difficult not to interpret these provisions as being peremptory to owners and occupiers. The House will appreciate that that flies in the face of our well-established procedures—based on the voluntary principle—for site safeguard. The whole basis of the voluntry approach to nature conservation management would be undermined if we not only told people how to manage their land in SSSIs but forced them to pay for that work.

The second reason for resisting the new clause and schedule is that the voluntary approach has stood the test of time in Scotland. Notification, allied with provision for the negotiation of management agreements and the procedure for making nature conservation orders, provides the opportunity for disagreements to be overcome. The fact that the last-resort powers of making nature conservation orders have been used so infrequently —in Scotland only 10 orders have been made when almost 1,300 SSSIs have been notified or renotified since 1981 —provides ample proof of that point. In addition, the new procedures that the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland introduced early this month for SSSIs should bring about a considerable reduction in the number of disagreements.

We are not convinced that any benefits would accrue from the new powers. I believe that they have the potential so to undermine the present system that they would hinder rather than further the management of land within SSSIs in a way that is sensitive to nature conservation interests.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for having given me notice that he would raise a matter in relation to the Carver report recommendations. I am aware that steps have been taken to secure the future of nationally relevant databases and methodologies, as he would wish. I can assure him, however, that the Carver report recommendations were fully implemented by the Environmental Protection Act 1990. All existing databases, methodologies and research contracts have been inherited by one of the new conservation bodies of the Joint Nature Conservancy Committee, as appropriate.

Nothing has been lost in the process. The Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland has taken over data and contracts relevant to Scotland. These will, in turn, be transferred to Scottish Natural Heritage. Great Britain, United Kingdom and other international matters will be dealt with by the three new country agencies, acting through the Joint Nature Conservancy Committee.

Only a few days ago, I was at the headquarters of the Countryside Commission for Scotland, at Battleby. The offices there, which are being converted, will be of assistance to the JNCC staff in the future.

The hon. Gentleman also raised a point about clause 2, about which we had a useful discussion in Committee. I should emphasise that we are aware of the concern expressed by the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors in Scotland that development in designated areas should be of the highest standard. That is entirely proper. Our answer is that the RICS's concern is already taken account of as regards national scenic areas and SSSIs.

There are no areas designated under the Countryside (Scotland) Act 1967 or the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Accordingly, there is no need for clause 2(2) to refer to those enactments. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman will be able to assure the institution that we are not trying to avoid the spirit of its proposals, since the essence of its concern has already been met. The present arrangements are satisfactory and will be carried forward to Scottish Natural Heritage when it comes into operation.

Mr. Galbraith: I am grateful to the Minister for his comments. He seems, however, to be slightly confused. He referred to the powers of last resort and nature conservation orders, but they are designed to deal with damaging activities on a site of special scientific interest. The new clause deals with the matter from the point of view of neglect. The question is not what a landowner may intend to do to a site but what he or she may fail to do. If a landowner were willing to enter into a land management agreement, it would cost him nothing. Therefore, the Minister's objections to the new clause are not well founded.

I accept his statement that the attempt to deal with these matters by agreement has worked reasonably well up to now. I should not like to interfere with that arrangement. However, this would be a reserve power, to be used in exceptional circumstances when a site of special scientific interest was endangered through neglect. In those circumstances, a land management agreement could be offered to the owner. If he refused the offer, only then would this reserve power come into effect.

Having heard the Minister's reassurances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

ACCESS TO THE COUNTRYSIDE

'(1) No landowner or any other person or group of persons shall take any action which prohibits or impedes or reduces reasonable public access to the countryside without first reporting such proposed action to SNH.

(2) SNH shall consult appropriate local authorities and advertise any proposed action under subsection (1) of this section.

(3) If any objections are registered with SNH, then SNH shall arrange for a public inquiry to be held before deciding whether to approve or reject any proposed action under subsection (1) of this section.'.—[Mr. Canavan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

During our debate on the Natural Heritage (Scotland) Bill it is appropriate that we should pay attention to public access to one of the most valuable parts of Scotland's natural heritage, the Scottish countryside. In terms of natural beauty, there are few, if any, countries which can equal Scotland. It is important to remember that the people of Scotland who, as a whole, have inherited that natural heritage have a duty to protect it, to ensure that it is used for the benefit of the people as a whole, and to pass it on to future generations for their enjoyment.

Unfortunately, the land—particularly the countryside—does not in law belong to the people as a whole. Huge countryside estates, including some of Scotland's most famous mountains, hills and glens, are owned by wealthy landlords such as the Duke of Buccleuch—with 277,000 acres—the Wills family—with 263,000 acres—Lord Seafield—with 185,000 acres—the Countess of Sutherland—with 158,000 acres—and the Duke of Westminster with 113,000 acres. It is worth remembering that it was people like the ancestors of the Sutherland family who were responsible for the Highland clearances. Some of the likes of them today are not content simply with owning huge tracts of land in Scotland; they seem to be intent on trying to keep the people of Scotland from enjoying access to that land. The House should try to do something about that. The enjoyment of the Scottish countryside should be the birthright of all the people of Scotland—and of people from further afield who come to Scotland to enjoy its natural beauty and its other assets.

I am not a lawyer, but, as I understand it, there is no common law of criminal trespass in Scotland and very little in the way of statute law and byelaws relating to criminal trespass. I hope that the Minister, who is a lawyer, will be able to say whether the law needs to be clarified and what improvements, if any, the Government have in mind, whatever the merits may be of my new clause.

My understanding is that, if someone is causing, or threatening to cause, damage to property, or is being a nuisance, a landowner can initiate civil action through the courts by reporting the matter to the sheriff court and seeking an interdict—although that could be granted only against a named person or persons. I should welcome clarification of that from the Minister, who is a well-known Scottish advocate.

Mr. Wilson: Is he?

Mr. Canavan: The Minister certainly was at one time.

It is my experience, and that of many who enjoy the countryside, that some landowners—not all—set a bad example by threatening walkers, climbers and innocent people even with violence. Those innocent people have no criminal intent; they want to enjoy a walk in the countryside or pursue a favourite sport or pastime.

I declare an interest as I regularly enjoy walking, hill running and climbing, most of which I do in the Scottish countryside. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Canavan]

Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), I cannot claim to have conquered all of Scotland's Munros. My hon. Friend is unique in the House—although I think that I might be the only hon. Member to have survived the Ben Nevis hill race on two occasions, and one has to be a bit of a masochist to enjoy that.

I wish to give a couple of examples of my experiences. One winter's day a few years ago, I, my brother and some friends arrived at daybreak in Glen Lyon to do some mountain climbing. My brother, who is more civilised and polite than me, courteously asked a chap in a tweed suit to tell us the best way to go up the mountain. The tweed suit gruffly replied, "You don't." It was difficult to argue with him because he had a gun and a big dog, and there were some other tweed-suited thugs lurking in the background. They told us in no uncertain terms to clear off because they were deer stalking. They made thinly veiled threats that, if we did not clear off, we risked being shot—I do not know whether by accident or design. I was so incensed by that attitude that I initially wanted to stand my ground. However, because of the undesirability of a by-election, my colleagues persuaded me that it would be better to climb another mountain.

I do not want to turn the debate into an argument about the morality or otherwise of certain blood sports, and whether they should even be taking place in the countryside. However, in all common sense there is a strong case for saying that there should be some regulation —preferably a statutory regulatory body—to decide whether certain activities should be given priority over other activities in certain areas at certain times. My new clause is a reasonable attempt to achieve that through the new Scottish Natural Heritage.

I shall give another example from my home area that shows the difficulties of gaining access to the countryside. Not long ago, I was doing a bit of cross-country running —a harmless enough pursuit. I was training for the London marathon, and my route took me through a country estate. I was accosted by the husband of the landowner, who shouted, "What the hell do you think you are doing?" I kept on running, and politely replied, "What does it look like? I'm running".

He drove ahead of me in his van and closed a gate to try to obstruct me. He virtually threatened me with violence if I went any further.

That man did not succeed in scaring me, but I know that other people in the area, and especially elderly people, have been intimidated by his behaviour. They are being deprived of access to the countryside so that they cannot even enjoy a walk. It is not even a walk with a dog; if it were, that man would probably argue that the dog might worry sheep if it were allowed off the leash. Groups of elderly people are too frightened to go walking through the countryside because they are being intimidated. That is unacceptable, and it is time that the House got to grips with the problem. Such thuggery by landowners cannot be allowed to continue.

I have quoted only two of my experiences; I could quote many more. Anyone who regularly enjoys countryside pursuits could cite many other instances of landowners using intimidatory and obstructive tactics, such as putting up barbed-wire fences and notices saying that trespassers will be prosecuted. Of course, in law the notices have no validity. Nevertheless, through that intimidatory behaviour, landowners are hounding and harassing innocent people, with the result that many of them are terrified of going into the countryside and enjoying Scotland's natural assets.

My new clause would help to put a stop to that nonsense. The procedure that it outlines is simple. If a landowner had reasonable cause to limit or prohibit public access to an area of the countryside, he would first have to report his proposal to Scottish Natural Heritage. The agency would then consult the appropriate local authorities and advertise the proposal—something similar to a planning application—and people would have the right to register their objections. If there were such objections, Scottish Natural Heritage would arrange an appropriate public inquiry before deciding whether to approve or to reject the proposal. That is a straightforward and common-sense proposal.

My new clause is a reasonable, practical measure that would clarify Scottish law. It would improve access to the countryside and it could lead to a charter on the right of the people to access to an important part of Scotland's natural heritage. I ask the House to accept it.

Sir Hector Monro: I followed what the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) said with great interest. He was right about the vagueness of the law of trespass —indeed, there is none. The best statement that I could obtain was from the Scottish Landowners Federation, of which I am a member, although I do not speak on its behalf. It is that no one has the right to enter anyone else's property without consent except by means of an established public footpath or roadway, and that anyone who does so is strictly a trespasser. The term "trespass" is in common use, but it has not been defined in Scotland in statute or by the courts. The main difference between Scotland and England on trespass is that the common law of Scotland, unlike that of England, provides no penalty for the simple act of trespass itself. Damage or nuisance must first be proved. That shows that in Scotland there is no law of trespass. There is, however, the right of ownership.

7.30 pm

We must try to bring people together when it comes to using and enjoying the countryside to the best of everyone's advantage. That is the key approach. I was quite taken by the approach of the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) in Committee, where he took a responsible attitude and rightly explained the wishes of so many people to use our wonderful countryside but said that, at the same time, they should not, as it were, overstep the mark or cause a nuisance to those carrying on farming. The achievement of that careful balance is the key factor.

So much depends upon attitudes. The hon. Member for Falkirk, West told us about his experience when running along a farm track. If he had stopped and asked the owner whether he would object if he, the hon. Gentleman, were to run along the track, I suspect that he would have been warmly welcomed to do so and told to enjoy his recreation. In many instances too much is taken for granted and not enough politeness is shown in using other people's property.

Those of us who frequently use the hills know that we must be careful about erosion and generally causing damage to the landscape. The dangers become clear when we consider what has happened to Ben Lomond and the damage that has been caused in the Cairngorms. There are other concerns that turn upon farming operations, especially at lambing time. Other worries arise at nesting time, especially for many of the birds that we are keen to protect.

I once had to speak for an hour in Committee about bulls on public footpaths. I dare say that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) had to put up with my speech. I am not sure whether he listened to it with enthusiasm. There are many who can identify a bull, but not a heifer or a cow with a calf. They can be every bit as dangerous as a bull. People must be very careful when wandering about the hills if they are not aware of what they are doing.

When so much depends on the rural economy and on providing employment in the countryside, we should not attack, as the hon. Member for Falkirk, West did, those who are carrying out legitimate sporting operations. Those activities are important and we must not prevent them. It must be realised that at certain times—for example, from mid-August to late September—important shooting takes place on the hills. The greatest worry is that on which the hon. Gentleman touched, stalking.

We were highly critical in Committee—the same criticism has been made in the press—about the insufficient cull of deer in Scotland, and especially of hind. Stalking hind is an intricate and difficult operation, especially during the short days in Scotland in mid-winter. If hikers, hill climbers or hill walkers are on the hills at the same time, the operation becomes virtually impossible. A little co-operation either way would make a tremendous difference to everyone enjoying himself while cohabiting with our landscape.

I shall not talk about the concerns that are expressed about litter, gates, fences and knocking down dykes. It is all too easy to think that we can climb a dyke. If the top stone is knocked out, however, the whole thing begins to fall down almost immediately. There is also the danger of fire in forests and, because of other factors, the inconvenience that is caused to fishermen. There must be a balance between water sports and the enjoyment of those who are fishing.

When I was a Minister in the Department of the Environment and concerned with rural affairs, there was an immense amount of work to be done in protecting footpaths and bridleways. It is a relatively low key matter in Scotland. I am not sure whether district and regional councils have taken enough interest in establishing or retaining footpaths and producing maps so that people may know where there are rights of way. Similarly, I am not sure whether enough has been done to ensure that rights of way are available to enable the public to enjoy the countryside. We in Scotland are lagging behind in the development of footpaths and rights of way.

So much could be taught in schools about how to enjoy the countryside, what to look out for and how not to be difficult at times that matter, such as nesting time and during critical farming operations. The hon. Member for Falkirk, West takes a swipe at the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry whenever he can. No one has done more than the duke and the Buccleuch estates to educate children in Scotland to appreciate the joys of the countryside. The duke takes many school parties to his estates at Bowhill, Drumlanrig and in Northamptonshire so that they may learn how an estate is run. They visit the sawmill, the farm, the gardens and the woodlands. The children leave with the feeling that they have begun to learn what enjoyment of the countryside is all about.

Anything that Scottish Natural Heritage can do to bring teachers and others to understand and to teach that appreciation in our schools, the better it will be. I know that it is said that the curriculum does not allow for such teaching, but if we cannot find time for things that matter, such as the countryside, much of our children's education will be lost.

It is extremely important to get right the balance of the use of the countryside. We must realise that everyone has an interest in achieving that. Only by working together in harmony will we all get the best out of the country.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: The major theme of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) was co-operation. That is clearly a reasonable goal when we talk about access to and use of the countryside. It is the traditional Scottish attitude to these matters. We believe that the land belongs to the people of Scotland and future generations of Scots. The land is merely held temporarily in trust by the present generation.

The Scottish attitude to our land and its enjoyment is that there should be freedom to roam, restricted only by the need to take care of the land and to be concerned about it. Passage should be allowed to those who give consideration to the needs of farmers and others who depend upon the land for their living. It is an alien experience when barriers are erected and rights of way are lost. The new clause seeks to clarify and consolidate the right of access of its people to the land of Scotland. I believe that it achieves the underlying purpose, within reasonable constraints, and will protect those who work on the land and gain a living by so doing.

The Scots have always taken a stroppy attitude to feudal landowners who try to get them off the hills. My only criticism of the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Canavan) is that he was not stroppy enough during the incidents which he described. There is no law of trespass worthy of the term in Scotland. A person's home and garden are fully protected from unwelcome visitors, and rightly so, but provided that people keep to the countryside code and cause no damage or disturbance to livestock, there should be no barriers to wandering over the mountains or generally enjoying our magnificent scenery.

Recent changes in ownership have led to certain changes in attitudes. Bit by bit, more and more estates are seeking to keep their lands for themselves and their friends. Many of the new estate owners come from the south of Britain, from the continent, the United States or the middle east, where the concept of public access to private property does not exist. There is a danger, because alien ideas are being introduced to Scotland by those who have no understanding of how the Scottish attitude to land has developed.

Those new attitudes have brought with them, from the Borders to the Highlands, a growing infestation of notice boards and signs preventing and restricting access. The undeniable fact that a landowner cannot prosecute for trespass and that public authorities have limited control over campers is ignored. It is unacceptable that rights of way should be blocked up, barbed wire laid down and fences put up restricting what are clearly rights of way and the ability of people to enjoy the land of Scotland.

[Mr. Andrew Welsh]

Instead of the people of Scotland still imagining that their country is freely available to them, the opposite is becoming the case. Unless action is taken to reverse such trends, we will simply be herded into forestry parks or reservations of one kind or another, and that would be a great loss to Scotland. I certainly would not like to see the bulk of the Scottish people herded around and directed to specific areas, leaving our hills, lochs and mountain tops the private preserve of the fortunate and selfish few. If that ever happened, we would all be the losers and the Government would have made a big mistake. Therefore, I welcome the new clause, which reinforces the rights of the people of Scotland to their own land.

One step in the direction of mediation and a straightforward way in which to help the people of Scotland would be if the Government were to consider ordnance survey maps which, in England, but not in Scotland, include rights of way. That would be a straightforward way in which to inform people of their rights, reinforcing traditional rights of access and preventing some of the worst practices of landlords taking over rights of way for their own purposes. Marking such rights of way on ordnance survey maps would be a simple way of informing people of their rights.

The new clause clarifies the legal basis for access to Scotland's natural heritage. It establishes the principle that landowners should not exclude walkers from their land except where damage or intrusion into personal privacy might result. Therefore, I support the new clause and hope that the Government will accede to its basic premise that the land of Scotland belongs to the people of Scotland, and that their reasonable enjoyment of it should be allowed in harmony with other land users.

Mr. Dalyell: About three months ago, I telephoned Sir James Stormonth Darling, the ex-secretary of the National Trust for Scotland, who is well known to the Minister and to my hon. Friends, on a completely unrelated matter. As soon as we had discussed our business, he said that he did not know why I was asking about that, because I should really be concerned about Mar Lodge.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have made a statement on that. I regret that the hon. Gentleman was not present.

Mr. Dalyell: I know, and very inadequate it was. If it had been a half-decent statement, the House would have been spared my speech, but it is precisely because it was such an inadequate statement that I make no apology, with the good will of my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith), for returning to the subject.

I spare the House my three months of interest in the subject, but this very day there has been a leader on it, not the one in the Scottish newspaper which has been quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden, but in a national paper. It is entitled "Preserving Mar Lodge", and it says:

"The decision by the American billionaire Mr. John Kluge to sell the 77,000 acre Mar Lodge estate in the Cairngorms raises questions about the future of a mountain landscape which is to Britain's natural environment what St. Paul's Cathedral is to our man-made heritage."

Mr. Galbraith: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dalyell: I am glad to hear my hon. Friend say, "Hear, hear." If there is scepticism among Conservative Members, let me put their minds at rest. This is not some Labour tabloid or newspaper; it is The Daily Telegraph. The leader writer goes on:

"The sale, which coincides with the formation of the Natural Heritage Agency for Scotland, also creates an opportunity which, if not taken, will be lost for generations. The disclosure that the Prince of Wales is involved in negotiations to buy the estate on behalf of the Crown Estate and the fledging Scottish Natural Heritage Agency shows that he believes that the opportunity to buy the estate for the nation must be grasped.

The Prince of Wales should be wary of public ownership where other options exist. But the case of Mar Lodge is special."

I did not think that there was much special about it from the response that my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden received from the Minister. I am on the side of The Daily Telegraph and against the Minister on this.

The Daily Telegraph says:

"But the case of Mar Lodge is special. It is so valuable that private ownership has meant foreign ownership for nearly 30 years. The rich men who have owned Mar Lodge have made mistakes—overstocking with deer and preventing one of the most magnificent fragments of Caledonian forests from regenerating, but they have kept it whole. The danger is now that a new buyer, anxious for a return on his investment, will split it up."

Many of us would say amen to that. I am one of those who is fortunate to know something of this wonderful countryside.

7.45 pm

The Daily Telegraph goes on:

"No government has faced up to the challenge of how to reconcile the conflicts in the Cairngorms, Britain's most important mountain landscape. Now there is the chance to demonstrate how to conserve nature on a large scale, while achieving income from sporting interests and restricting access to those who are prepared to make the long walk in. All depends on Mr. Lang, the Scottish Secretary"— or should we say, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton)

"He should be clear on two things: that endorsing the purchase of Mar Lodge would banish doubt about the Government's commitment to nature conservation, and that it would prove enormously popular among the moderate opinion that the Conservative party badly needs to win back in Scotland."

It is not my business to suggest to the Conservative party how to win votes, but it is my business to say that there is a strong feeling that this is a major litmus test for Scottish Natural Heritage. The kind of statement that the Minister has made simply will not do for serious Scottish opinion.

I do not criticise the Secretary of State for having just come in, but I am referring his ministerial colleague to the leading article on Mar Lodge in The Daily Telegraph today, of which I plead with him to take notice.

I shall not abuse the time of the House, but I want to refer briefly to the statement made by Robert Edwards on 19 April:

"Prince Charles was asked by Magnus Magnusson, chairman of the Nature Conservancy Council in Scotland, to approach the American billionaire, John Kluge, about the forthcoming sale of his 77,000-acre Mar Lodge estate which contains three of Britain's five highest mountains, rare flora and fauna. Kluge apparently refused to give the estate to the nation, but did agree to offer it to the Government or a consortium of voluntary organisations at the reduced price of £10 million, half of which could be paid over the next five years. It is expected to fetch over £13 million on the market."

Are those figures available to the Scottish Office?

The Minister will know what I am talking about if I say, in parentheais and without going into detail, that some individual properties have had millions—in the plural—of pounds from the national heritage memorial fund. We are not talking about something extraordinary but, dare I say, about less than the price of one Tornado. However, that is by the bye.

An article in The Guardian stated:

"Kluge appears to have set a deadline, the first week of May. Magnusson, unable to convince the Scottish Secretary . . . to fight the Treasury for cash, this week appealed to conservation organisations for help with emergency funding."

There is nothing more urgent or important on the agenda of the infant body than a decision about Mar Lodge. If that body acted on Mar Lodge, it could receive a great deal of good will, and if some of it accrued to the Conservative party, so be it.

I am not so inexperienced as to ask the Minister to get up to make a statement straight away, after what he said to my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith). However, I should like him to tell us tonight that, tomorrow and in the coming week Ministers, will discuss the issue, possibly with a view to revising their opinion. It would be a heck of a pity if the historic chance to do something of lasting importance for the countryside of Scotland were lost.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): It is 107 years since James Bryce introduced the Access to Mountains Bill. For 107 years, the country has been waiting for a right for the people of this country to have access to the open countryside, which they should have the right to enjoy.

I hope that my colleagues will forgive an Englishman for participating in the debate, but I claim a long and abiding passion for the Scottish landscape and countryside. Over the years, I have spent many happy days roaming the hills, mountains and wilderness of Scotland. I am delighted to say that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) the shadow Chancellor, is now following in my footsteps and has embarked on the herculean task of completing the ascent of Scotland's 277 Munros.

Barring a number of historical incidents of some notoriety—most notably perhaps, the famous battle of Glen Tilt, when an eminent professor and his students were on a geological expedition in the late Victorian years and were set upon by a landowner and his ghillies—the tradition in the Scottish hills, which is a good tradition, has on the whole been one of consensus. There has been reasonable access for those who want to walk, climb and take recreation in the Scottish countryside and, in return for their responsibility, permission for that access has been granted by the landowners. That consensus has been based on good will and, on the whole, it has worked. It has not worked by walkers asking permission every time they wanted to walk on any footpath—as I suspect the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) intended—but it has been a tradition of responsibility on the one side and access granted on the other.

However, there are three problems that increasingly threaten the good practice of that tradition. First, the law does not always work well. Sadly, an increasing number of landowners deny access to reasonable members of the public who have no intention of causing damage to the landowners' property.

A few years ago, I was sitting on top of one of the hills just to the south of Lochnagar in an area of rolling countryside and great beauty. My brother and I had walked on three or four of the mountains in the area. We were at summit Cairn when we were approached by an irate landowner who—as in the experience of my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan)—carried a gun and was surrounded by a group of ghillies. He summarily ordered us off the mountain.

We were doing no damage; we were not disturbing any sporting interests and we were not disturbing any movement of deer. We were merely out for a walk. The special irony of the event was that we were sitting in a national nature reserve—the Caenlochan nature reserve. Despite that, the landowner was able to use his intimidatory powers to remove us from the land. When something of that type can happen, I contend that the law is not operating properly or fairly in the interests of all.

So the first problem is that the law does not always operate well. The second problem is that there is general confusion in the minds of many people who go into the Scottish hills about the exact state of the law. As the hon. Member for Dumfries stated, the law is somewhat unclear, because it does not prescribe a provision of trespass but it neverthless enables a landowner in some circumstances to remove a person from his land with the use of minimum force. An unclear law is not a good law. The new clause rightly seeks to clarify the law.

The third problem is precisely the provision for the use of minimum force. Where it is possible for a landowner to remove walkers from his or her land by intimidation—by hassling them, by threats or perhaps by revealing rather obviously the possession of a gun—there must always be a potential problem. My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West wishes to put that right, and I support him. He is attempting not only to put the law into a clearer perspective but to move it closer to, for example, Swedish provisions for access, which work well. They are supported almost universally within Sweden; they preserve the right balance between the landowner's right of privacy and the general public's right of access, and enshrine those rights sensibly in legal form.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West will be successful in prevailing on the Government, although I doubt it. If we were able to enshrine such a provision in law for Scotland, I hope that it would give a lead for England and Wales. Therefore, I support the new clause.

The natural heritage of Scotland is unsurpassed. It is a landscape of breathtaking beauty. It has peaks, ridges, lochs and desolation in some of the wildest parts of our country, and they should be for all to enjoy and to share. It should not be up to anyone, however mighty, to remove that opportunity for enjoyment from the rest of us. My hon. Friend seeks to secure that enjoyment for us and for future generations. It is a noble cause, and I support him in it.

8 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I understand and share the objectives of the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) who moved the new clause in his purpose of seeking to enlarge the freedom of the citizen to have access to Scottish rural areas. However, I am doubtful about the mechanisms that he has proposed to achieve it. His proposal appears to put in the hands of a Government-appointed quango the decision whether a right of access should be enjoyed in a particular area.

That is a dangerous new power to give to a body such as Scottish Natural Heritage, and it could further restrict access in a way that would supplement and even empower proprietors to be more exclusive than some of them are at present. By simply prevailing on SNH that it had a good case to exclude the public, the proprietor would have the imprimatur of official approval which, at present, his ownership of itself may not give him. Far from achieving the purposes of Professor Bryce, to whom the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) so eloquently referred, I fear that the hon. Member for Falkirk, West could set back the very cause for which he so eloquently pleaded.

We should not be unduly hung up on the precise terms and proposals of the hon. Member for Falkirk, West, who identifies a serious and important issue. Many of us who represent parts of the country to which the public wish to have access in increasing numbers are conscious that there is a problem of reconciliation of interests which should be tackled and that the law, with all the obscurities to which the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) referred, may not resolve the difficulties which are increasingly sharp in certain areas.

Mention was made of the acquisition of estates by those who have shown less sensitivity to the custom and practice of those who have lived in the countryside than used to be the case. I do not, of course, exempt some of those who have lived in and known estates for a very long time from all blame for over-zealous exclusion of the public from their property.

This type of debate invites anecdotal evidence in support of whatever point of view one wishes to put. I do not want to go too far down the road of recalling the occasion in the Strath of Kildonan when the proprietor spoke, with accents of earlier years, pretty roughly to me when I was sitting by the roadside eating a sandwich, having just been re-elected as member of Parliament. She spoke roughly in terms of the possible damage that I would do to her property by sitting there and allowing the crumbs from my lunch to fertilise the moss around me. Her remarks may have been animated by a certain disappointment about the result of the election. On the whole, I have not found such an attitude among those who have lived and worked in the area, whether proprietors or others.

There are less attractive examples among the factors of estates. Factors often show the least sympathy for the public interest in access. They are rather at the sharp end of the conflict. There have been occasions when factors have deployed arguments that suggest that there is no time of year in some areas when it is suitable for the public to have access. They say that there is no time because it is either the time when people are stalking or shooting, or the time when the birdlife is breeding and the very scent of a human being could be enough to upset the eco-system over which the factors preside as the agents of the proprietor. Such an argument shows a certain lack of sympathy and understanding, and increases the desire to legislate where it is difficult to legislate without completely running into conflict over the use of land.

Certain uses of land are inconsistent with public access at certain times. It is not consistent with public access to stalk or to drive grouse across a moor. Many other forms of activity have some benefit for rural areas, but are inconsistent with public access at certain times. The limits to those times should be subject to some agreement and understanding. We may be reaching a time when the most constructive way forward would be to seek to agree for particular areas codes of practice with proprietors and representatives of the public who could, publicly and openly, express their view of the public interest in an area of land.

Like others, including the hon. Member for Falkirk, West, I do not wish to use the debate to run through the arguments about the appropriateness of blood sports. Field sports play a significant part, at least, in the highlands economy. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman or anyone else would wish to end such sports as a side wind of the proposal. That is not the purpose of the new clause.

However, we cannot rest absolutely content with the law and practice as they stand. In the past, the law has allowed gentlemen such as the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, whose hill-climbing endeavours fill less energetic Members with nothing but admiration, to reach those achievements broadly unimpeded, although with one or two unpleasant experiences such as that with which the hon. Gentleman regaled the House. He and others are right to point to the threat of change from the arrival of people who are less than sensitive to the growing public interest in access.

We cannot reconcile those interests by old-fashioned means and by old-fashioned proprietorial power, with sticks, dogs, guns and threatening notices that imply or threaten action against those who appear on the land.

I suggest to the Under-Secretary of State that he has an opportunity to emphasise the desirability of reconciling those interests and of reaching agreement on how they should be reconciled. That cannot be done Scotland-wide. The interests of heavily populated areas close to Glasgow, where the countryside is much more penetrated by people on weekend or even evening outings, are different from the interests of the more sparsely populated areas, further from population centres.

If codes of practice are the route to follow, they must be studied and negotiated for areas narrower than Scotland as a whole. However, the time has come to take a lead in this, perhaps with the Scottish Landowners Federation. The time has come to discuss their interests and the interests expressed by the Ramblers Association, organisations promoting tourism and others to seek to ensure that the coutryside in Scotland, which is part of our heritage and with which we are concerned in the Bill, remains attractive and as open as we would like it to be.

Mr. Bill Walker: I represent a constituency with huge agricultural and shooting interests and with a large tourist-related economy. I shall be brief, but I feel that it is important that anyone debating the measures contained in this clause should fully understand that we can have the economy that we have in Perthshire and in the part of Angus that I represent, with a balance in the use of land, only if people understand that balance. There have been some interesting, thoughtful and helpful speeches on that.

There are times when it is just not suitable for people to wander willy-nilly around parts of Perthshire and Angus.

They are a danger to themselves and to everyone else, and one must recognise that. There are other times when people are welcome, as they are in their hundreds of thousands in my constituency. They are certainly welcome on the slopes of Glen Shee, which has become increasingly popular, and I am delighted that it has had a good season this winter.

The jobs provided from all those different activities show that the balance is important. There would be no economy in my constituency if there were not a balance between the rural and tourist-related interests, which are the providers of jobs. When anyone says that they believe that they should have unlimited access to any part of my constituency, I tell them that that is unrealistic. I spend a lot of my time walking around the mountain areas of my constituency and, because they are so beautiful, I understand why they attract people.

Mr. Dalyell: I would be interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's views on the Mar Lodge estate issue, although I know that it is just outside his constituency.

Mr. Walker: I know the Mar Lodge estate quite well. Like the hon. Member for Linlithgow, I think that it is much too valuable an asset not to be available to the public at large, if that can be arranged, and I believe that it can. The hon. Gentleman will also know that in that part of Scotland there has been little difficulty in getting access. I used to live at the end of Glen Clova and I used to walk regularly over the top of the hills. There were never any problems. In those days, it was not unusual to bump into members of the royal family. They did not know me, but I knew who they were, so I had the advantage over them.

Let me make it clear that I was speaking largely to the interests of my own constituency and drawing the attention of the House to the importance of balancing rural interests with those of tourists and leisure and recreation activities. People who use the countryside extensively understand that balance. I find that the only people who give trouble are those who have an axe to grind for some reason or another. People who are interested in that balance and interested in the use of the countryside rarely have difficulty in being accommodating, either in their interests or their activities.

8.15 pm

Mr. Galbraith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) for moving the amendment, and to all those hon. Members who have spoken and have covered the ground fairly well, making it easy for me to be brief.

I cannot claim, as my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West can, to have run up and down Ben Nevis in the Ben Nevis hill race. I am not a masochist. Nor can I claim, as my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) can, to have climbed all the Munros. I am not a Munro bagger, with or without a beard, as Muriel Gray would have it.

I can claim to have spent the largest part of my life in the Scottish mountains—or at least most of the weekends of my life. I started initially with the Renfrewshire hills and moved on to the Scottish mountains, the Alps and then to the Himalayas. I shall repeat what I said in Committee, which the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) obviously noted. Throughout that time in the mountains and on the many trips that I have made to climb their rock and ice faces, I have never had any difficulty with access.

I do not have any experiences such as those that have been recounted by my hon. Friends. I have sometimes had to change my plans because of stalking or for other reasons, but that was always easily accommodated by a discussion with the keeper who would give me directions to go elsewhere. Perhaps I am fortunate, but that is my experience. That is due to the traditional nature of access to the Scottish mountains, from which we have all benefited.

The traditional right of access is best summed up by Lord Thurso, one of the ogre figures mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson). We do not often agree with the noble Lord, but I think that we should again quote what he has said about access to his land:

> "I'm perfectly content with the Scots law of trespass which is that you can walk across my land but you can't stop and use it . . . Everybody has a right of passage, but only the owner has a right of use. This approach suits me perfectly well. It works very well and always has done."

I accept that that is the way that access has traditionally worked. In my case and for many other people, and even for my hon. Friends, it has worked very well, apart from a few exceptions.

However, we must recognise that the position in the Scottish mountains is changing, for whatever reasons. It might be due to a change in landowners' use, although I am not necessarily sure that that is the case as there were always troublesome landlords in the past and some new ones may or may not be more troublesome. There is also the question of forestry land which has been sold to private owners, which will obviously affect access.

Whatever the reasons for a change in attitude, there is no doubt that it has changed. It came home to me only at the weekend. As many hon. Members will know, for obvious reasons, I have been away from the mountains for about three years. I was in Glen Coe once again at the weekend, at the Kingshouse, from where one can gain access to the Black Mount estate. When I passed by there I noticed the increased hassle factor, as we would describe it on the mountains. A road leads up towards Ben Alder from just beside the Kingshouse. It had always had open access, but now there is a closed gate and a rather large sign pointing out that it is private land and listing all sorts of stipulations. None of the signs has any legal basis, but if one is unclear about whether one can gain access and about one's rights there is no doubt that notices saying "Don't trespass" and "Private land" are intimidating. The hassle factor is increasingly occurring on Scottish land. Unless it is dealt with now, it will cause further disturbance as more and more people seek access to the Scottish mountains.

There is no doubt that more and more people are frequenting the mountains. In the early 1960s, if one went to the north side of Ben Nevis to do one of the climbs on an August bank holiday, one might have been the only person there. I remember one bank holiday when I was the only person on the face of Ben Nevis. I was climbing an observatory buttress.

Now, although not in the Lake District proportions where one has to queue, more and more people are seeking access to the mountains in Scotland. There is a climb known as Point Five. Aficionados among us will know that that is a nice, high-standard, popular climb. It was climbed for the first time only in the 1960s, yet by the late 1960s to early 1970s, we had to start queuing at 3 o'clock in the morning to gain access to the mountain, almost as one does in the Alps.

The Countryside Commission for Scotland recently asked System Three to carry out a poll on access to the countryside. It was found that 61 per cent. of the people sampled—almost two thirds of the respondents—claimed that they walked in the countryside of Scotland. Almost two thirds of the population claim to climb or walk in the countryside of Scotland. That is the extent of the problem.

The recent Munro book by the Scottish Mountaineering Trust almost instantly sold 50,000 copies. We can extrapolate from that that between 10,000 and 15,000 trips are made to the mountains each year. Of the people who went into the mountains, 61 per cent. had difficulty knowing where they were going and what their rights of access were. Three quarters of the sample—almost 72 per cent.—agreed that people should have freer and better access to the mountains.

The survey showed how public opinion regards the problem. The problem must be set against the ever-increasing number of difficulties. I do not have any personal anecdotes of difficulty with access, but many examples are coming into the public domain. We have all heard about the troubles of the Kintail mountain rescue team. It wanted to produce a booklet on walks in the Kintail region in order to raise funds. The local landowner threatened to prevent the team from gaining access to his land, even for mountain rescue purposes.

In fairness to the Scottish Landowners Federation, it disowned the position taken by the landowner. It has always been reasonable and I commend it for that. It regards the traditional approach as the correct one. It wishes to negotiate access and achieve a balanced approach. It did not support its member in Kintail. The letters column of the West Highland Free Press contained a letter from one member who was threatened with prevention of access. That is a most excellent journal run by an extremely able individual, although I am not sure who he is. Sometimes I am not sure whether he knows who he is. The member said:

"I have enjoyed hill walking for over 20 years and have always attempted to co-operate with the estates over stalking etc. Increasingly, however, I have had blanket refusals of access, even though there is no stalking in the immediate area."

There is a nice wee footnote at the bottom which says:

"Donations to Kintail Mountain Rescue Team funds should be sent to Sergeant Charles Gillies, Police Station, Kyle of Lochalsh."

I read that out for the benefit of hon. Members.

That is one of the incidents which have arisen. A more recent one took place on Saturday 13 April 1991 on the lands of Lord Pearson of Rannoch.

Sir Hector Monro: Ah.

Mr. Galbraith: The hon. Member for Dumfries obviously knows Lord Pearson.

Sir Hector Monro: No.

Mr. Galbraith: The hon. Gentleman wishes to dissociate himself from Lord Pearson of Rannoch. I realise why. Lord Pearson was the famous individual of the sites of special scientific interest amendment in the Lords.

Four hill walkers were on open hill on Lord Pearson's land, 3 km from Rannoch station, when they were told to get off by two men wearing military garb. The men said that it was a shooting area and gave no other explanation. They said that the owner of the land was Lord Pearson.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that from time to time the military make use of that part of his Lordship's estate. It is possible that the men were in military garb, and properly entitled to be so.

Mr. Galbraith: As far as I know, the area is not under the control of the Ministry of Defence, so, whether shooting was going on there or not, the men had no right to ask others to remove themselves from the area or to do so on behalf of Lord Pearson.

I hope that the Minister will comment on another worrying development on access to the land. I hope that he will dissociate himself from it. Professor Sir Frederick Holliday, the chairman of the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, was reported in the Press and Journal on 22 January as saying that there should be "a system of tradeable permits for public access to the countryside, with prices set by the government or the landlords."

That is a most worrying development. Access to the countryside would be restricted and controlled by permits which would be sold.

Not unnaturally, the Ramblers Association was somewhat upset by that limitation of access to the land. It wrote to Professor Sir Frederick Holliday. He replied:

"The report in the Press and Journal was only partly correct. I have long held the view that access to certain parts of the countryside will have to be restricted and paid for."

That was said by the chairman of the Joint Nature Conservation Committee. That is a Government body. Does the Minister agree with that? Will he take this opportunity to dissociate himself and his Government from that statement?

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West for introducing the amendment. It deals with access to the countryside. I would like the traditional method to continue. I have had no problems with it in the past. However, there are increasing difficulties. We seek simply to provide a right of access to mountain areas—not to allow use or abuse of the mountain areas. We seek simply a right of access and clarification of the law. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will look favourably on the new clause.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I agree with what the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) said earlier. There is no common law of criminal trespass. The hon. Gentleman asked me for my legal opinion. He was also correct in saying that an interdict, which can be granted, can take effect only against a named person. Civil liability exists only for damage caused by trespass—for example, if someone took a dog into an area in calving or lambing season and upset the animals. Trampling of a cornfield could also be considered unreasonable.

My hon. Friend the member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) correctly stated the position in law. The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) also gave a clear definition of the position. I am glad that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) spoke in the debate. We welcome hon. Members, who, although they represent other parts of Britain, greatly enjoy the countryside of Scotland. He said that the natural heritage of Scotland was unsurpassed and should be for all to enjoy. I am wholeheartedly in agreement with that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) stressed the importance of a balance in the use of land. That is absolutely correct. In Scotland, we have traditionally enjoyed the freedom to roam, derived from a mutual respect and understanding between those who own and manage the land and those who wish to use the land for recreation. In the eyes of the majority of commentators, this relationship has worked well and it is one that we are determined to see continue. We do not believe that the simple solution proposed by the new clause is the right solution. It not only ignores the many complex issues that surround access but introduces its own particular difficulties. For example, I do not envy the person asked to adjudicate, under the terms of subsection (1) whether the restriction or denial of access was reasonable.

Even if one gets over that hurdle, the new clause is unnecessary. Where Scottish Natural Heritage identifies a need for a particular track of land to be accessible, it will have a range of powers to negotiate means of securing that access. It will, under clause 12, be empowered to negotiate access agreements and, where appropriate, seek the Secretary of State's approval for an access order.

8.30 pm

Scottish National Heritage will also be able to negotiate management orders under section 49(a) of the Countryside (Scotland) Act 1967, as amended by schedule 10. With those powers, the SNH will be able to negotiate the means to protect the national heritage where necessary. Those powers are more flexible than the specific legislative provision in the new clause and would allow for a clearer focusing of priorities as to where access is necessary.

I accept what has been said about more needing to be done. Indeed, it is for that reason that a thorough-going review is currently being carried out by the Countryside Commission for Scotland. The commission has been involved in opening up access among many waterways in Scotland. The Clyde Calders initiative is one near a centre of population, so a great many benefit from that, and that is a good use of public funds.

In carrying out this review, we are also involving the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, but it would be premature to take any action before the review is completed. There will, of course, be full consultation and decisions should not be made before that has been carried out. We welcome the initiative and look forward to an early report. We feel that at this stage it would be inadvisable to cut across the detailed consideration of the review by introducing a new legislative provision of this type, bearing in mind that access agreements can, and we very much hope will, be forthcoming.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) spoke about Mar Lodge. It is premature to make any decisions. Negotiations are under way concerning the purchase, and the means to finance the management, of the estate. Until they are concluded and the proposition is put to the Secretary of State, it would be unreasonable to expect the Government to make any commitment. The hon. Gentleman will see in Hansard precisely what I said this evening in response to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Galbraith rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the Minister giving way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Dalyell.

Mr. Dalyell: It may be premature, but I think that what we can sensibly ask for tonight is that, before any irrevocable move is made, there will be at meeting of Ministers to discuss matters. Once the sale starts, without compensation and all sorts of legal entanglements, it will be a juggernaut that cannot be stopped. I am asking a straight question of the Secretary of State and the Minister. Can we be certain that, before any procedure starts, there will be a meeting of Ministers at which the excellent and powerful leader in The Daily Telegraph will be taken into account? It says:

"Now there is the chance to demonstrate how to conserve nature on a large scale, while achieving income from sporting interests and restricting access to those who are prepared to make the long walk in. All depends on Mr. Lang, the Scottish Secretary."

Well, for his own house journal—no, I must not say that. If a distinguished newspaper such as The Daily Telegraph, a newspaper that I respect very much, in a clever article, says that, surely it is time to step back and think.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought that the Minister was giving way.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: I thought that I had finished, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I will just say——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I asked the Minister if he was giving way and he indicated that he was.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: I was not aware that I had given way but, if that is your ruling, I can respond in one sentence by saying that I will keep in touch with the situation but I cannot go further than that at present.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us be quite clear. Is the Minister giving way or is he not?

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: I think that I have finished now.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Minister is not giving way. In that case, do I have another speaker? Mr. Galbraith.

Mr. Wilson: I will take over where my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) left off. I think that my hon. Friend wanted to point out to the Minister that he had not replied to the important question about the letter from the chairman of the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, Professor Sir Frederick Holliday. In it, the professor came up with the remarkable statement:

"I have long held the view that access to certain parts of the countryside will have to be restricted and paid for."

I hope that the Minister will come in at the end of my brief remarks in order to respond.

Mr. Maclennan: Before the hon. Gentleman concludes his brief remarks, will he agree that the attitude expressed by Professor Holliday must make some of us pause before putting into the hands of SNH the power to determine whether public access should exist that is provided for in this clause. Although we understand and welcome the desire to increase public access, many of us do not think that this is the way to do it.

Mr. Wilson: The point is extremely well taken and I will come to it in a moment.

I do not want to delay the House at all but there is a wider perspective to the access question. What worries me about the debate is this. Everything that has been said by the Opposition parties is correct. There is always concern for the use of walkers and climbers and all the other people who go into the countryside for leisure purposes. The deprivation of access to the Scottish countryside and to huge areas of the natural terrain of Scotland has a much longer history than that. It affects communities that once lived and worked there and are now denied access in that broader sense.

What we are now down to in many areas is the margin of the debate. When there are people out with guns frightening off the odd individual that comes along, that is the last stage in the process. The major work of denying access was done by past generations, who got rid of the bulk of the people who lived and worked and had a right to be in that area.

I am conscious of the argument that this is all due to a new breed of landlord, people who do not understand the Scottish countryside, and so on. In the days of the old breed of landlord, Jock was as good as his master and everyone lived happily in a sort of Caledonian Valhalla. It is rubbish. These problems have been created by the old breed of landlord, the people who removed the vast bulk of the people from the land in the first place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) referred to the Glen Tilt case. There we had a fine Scottish figure of a man—the Duke of Athol of that time—driving people off the land. He told the Cambridge students, "It is not a public way. It is my private drive. You shan't come down. The deer are coming. The deer are coming."

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow has been quoting from The Daily Telegraph editorials of 1991, but we can go back 100 years to the editorial in The Times based on that incident. The Times devoted a long leader to the incident in which it said:

> "The public have as perfect a right of way through the Vale of Glen Tilt as the Duke of Athol has to the possession of any acre of the property which constitutes his estate. The right in the one place, as the title in the other, is the mere creature of law."

The leader concluded as follows:

> "The two Cambridge students would have an easier remedy against the Duke of Athol if they cared to bestir themselves in the business. Certainly it would be rendering the public a service to bring this hotheaded foolish man to his senses."

I should be quite interested to know now whether the right of way in Glen Tilt—

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that Glen Tilt is also in my constituency and there is no problem today getting into Glen Tilt, and I regularly picnic there with my family. In fact, there is only one shepherd living there now. However, 20 or 30 men from Glen Tilt went to the Korean war. That gives some idea of the change that has taken place in that glen.

Mr. Wilson: I am delighted to hear that. If it is so, it is only because, over the generations, the right of access has been asserted on a regular basis.

The great causes célèbres concerning access in the highlands and islands have not involved individual hill walkers. Consider the pet lamb case in Kintail, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) will know. It was absolutely crucial from the point of view of asserting the right of the people who lived there to put their stock on to estates. The pet lamb had wandered into a deer forest owned by a man called Winnis. He invoked the whole majesty of the law to deny the right to put even one lamb on the land. That case was not about individual access; it was about the right of a community to access to huge swathes of land that had been taken from it.

This is not some new phenomenon. Consider the last land raids in the highlands and islands, which took place after the second world war. The Nazi collaborator Lord Brockett was the owner of a large estate. The men coming home from the war, who had fought against the side that the noble Lord had supported, were denied the right to establish themselves in smallholdings. He, too, invoked the majesty of the law to remove them. At present, issues of access concern individuals, who might be told by some latter-day charlatan, "Get off. This is my land." The reason the conflict has been removed is that the mass of the people have been removed. That is the historic background.

I am interested in rights of access and in legislation on rights of access, but I am not concerned simply with the protection of hill walkers and mountaineers. All these people are perfectly worthy, but my concern is to assert the right of people to have access once again to all the land that can make a community more viable. The greatest obscenity in the highlands and islands is that tiny communities have to cling for their very existence to a peninsula or island, while the vast area behind them is denied to them as it is still held for deer, or for some other useless purpose for which it was taken a century or a century and a half ago. Until that historic wrong has been righted, the whole issue of access to land in Scotland, particularly in the highlands and islands, will not have been addressed. The issue should have been addressed, politically and legislatively, a long time ago. There is much unfinished business.

I accept the remarks of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) about the other side of this argument, about the danger of putting the power in the hands of conservation bodies or of defining too tightly the areas to which people should have access. If areas are defind too tightly, it may be inferred that areas that are not defined are not open to people. This is the argument against rights of way. The balance has to be maintained. This matter will be considered by a Labour Government. It is necessary to get the balance right and, where necessary, to enshrine rights.

In this context, it is appropriate to quote Bill Murray, a respected mountaineer and writer on mountains. He said recently:

> "There is now too much uncertainty about the legal situation regarding public access to land."

That is one side of the coin. The other is that we should not, for the sake of giving a liberal freedom, over-restrict by defining a liberal freedom. That is the balance we must get right.

In conclusion——

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Alan Clark): Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson: The Government Whip should not come in at this point to say, "Hear, hear."

Mr. Clark: I said it.

Mr. Wilson: Maybe the Minister should watch his tongue. We know something about his activities in the part of the world about which we are talking. If he wants to have the debate turned in that direction——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will oblige me by returning to the amendment.

Mr. Wilson: If the Minister does not desist, he and his hon. Friends will be here for a very long time tonight. We shall be delighted to get into a debate about the stewardship of land in the highlands and islands and about his right to hold so much land there. If he wants to have a debate, let him come to the Dispatch Box. Many hon. Members would say that he has no such right and that he is an impediment to the lives of, and a parasite upon, the people of the highlands and islands. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Wilson: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to intervene? Can he speak only from his backside position? Does he want to enter into the debate?

Sir Hector Monro: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Will you please ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the word "parasite"? Surely it is quite improper.

8.45 pm

Madam Deputy Speaker: I should be obliged if the hon. Gentleman would withdraw the word "parasite" so that we may get on with the debate in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Wilson: I shall alter it to say that the whole breed of landlords, particularly absentee landowners in the highlands and islands, are parasites. I say so with absolute confidence. This is not peculiar to the Minister. He is one of that breed. Let me remind you, Madam Deputy Speaker, that it was he, with his remarks from a sedentary position, who introduced this note into the debate. These issues matter to the people who live in the region. The Minister is an irrelevance at best, and a parasite at worst.

Mr. Alan Clark: The hon. Gentleman should not make accusations of that kind. I do not give a damn whether this may be thought to be extraneous to the debate. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] I withdraw the word "damn". I do not care a fig for the niceties of this procedure. The hon. Gentleman has made accusations against me. He should justify those accusations. I suspect that he does not know anything about the way in which my family administers its land in Sutherland. We believe that we administer it as responsibly and decently as possible. The hon. Gentleman should flesh out his accusations. He need take only a minute and a half to do so. I should be glad to listen to any charge in support of his serious allegations. Some would say that such allegations against a parliamentary colleague are improper.

Mr. Wilson rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am more interested, and the House is more interested, in hearing a debate about the amendment that is before us than in hearing a debate about personalities. I shall be grateful if hon. Members on both sides of the House would deal with the amendment.

Mr. Wilson: I shall be very happy to get back to the subject under debate. May I say, for the record, that I was totally unaware of the hon. Gentleman's presence in the Chamber until he chose to intervene?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The record will stand.

Mr. Wilson: The record will stand, as will my remarks.

This is a debate about access to land in Scotland. It is about the need for legislation to assert the historic right to roam. It is about freedom of access to land and about the redevelopment of communities which have been excluded in recent times. These are proud clauses with a very long history, and I am very pleased to associate myself with them.

Question put and negatived.

Clause 3

DUTY TO TAKE ACCOUNT OF CERTAIN MATTERS

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 2, line 44, leave out ', and' and insert

( ) the interests of owners and occupiers of land, and'.

Clause 3 identifies the wide range of interests that the SNH should take into account in carrying out its functions. We have been reflecting further on the wording of the paragraphs of this clause to ensure that they are both all-embracing and have sufficient clarity to enable the SNH to operate effectively. The needs of agriculture, fisheries and forestry and the needs of social and economic development in Scotland or any part of Scotland cover the majority of situations. We accepted an amendment tabled in another place to the effect that the SNH should take appropriate account of the interests of local communities.

As was said in Committee, the definition of "communities" is not an easy one. We wish to ensure that the interests of owners and occupiers of land, who will be major partners with SNH in conserving and enhancing the natural heritage, are taken fully into account. Without taking the interests of owners and occupiers of land, as well as the interests of local communities, into account, the SNH will not be able to perform its statutory functions effectively.

I emphasise that, while the amendment in no way means that SNH will be beholden to owners and occupiers of land, it will be expected, where appropriate, to take their interest into account, along with the other needs and interests set out in the clause, in carrying out its functions. It will be for SNH to judge in each case what the balance should be between the different needs and interests as set out in the clause. I hope that the House will also appreciate that SNH is expected to take only appropriate account of those various needs and interests. It cannot override its primary aims and purposes as set out in clause 1.

Mr. Dalyell: How much consultation has taken place over this issue? I understand from Dave Morris, representing the ramblers, from Wildlife Link, from Michael Taylor and others, that there has been little consultation, and that, in any event, the consultation period was due to go on until the late summer. People are asking, in effect, "Are the Government not sufficiently interested in our views to wait until the consultation has taken place?" The Government may have their side of the story on that. If so, may we be told it? I ask because serious people who are not automatically hostile to the Government are aggrieved by what has occurred. Will the Minister clarify the position?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am not certain to what the hon. Gentleman is referring. There have been a number of consultation documents and we have tabled the amendment partly as a result of debates in the other place on the balance, duty and nature of the provision to ensure that it covers all necessary matters, without making it too specific, so that we shall not have to change the clause year by year. We think that we have the balance right and that it is appropriate for the amendment to be made.

Mr. Maclennan: I welcome the amendment. It may open up the possibility of judicial review of action taken by the SNH, which is apparently in defiance of the interests of owners and occupiers of land. It may give them a locus standi in the courts. That may be a residual remedy if the SNH were to exercise its functions with little regard for some of the interests of the community, in the way in which the predecessor organisation did in the past. I believe that some people with interests in, for example, forestry and farming or in activities with some economic benefit to the community, had those interests interfered with by the predeessor organisation. They will now have access to the courts, and while that may never be necessary —I hope that disputes will be resolved amicably—the amendment could be valuable in that respect and should be supported.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 19

Drought orders

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 13, leave out lines 22 to 24 and insert

'and where applications are made both by a board and by an authority in respect of the same locality, the Secretary of State may make separate drought orders in favour of the board and in favour of the authority.'.

This amendment seeks to clarify that the Secretary of State may, if appropriate, grant orders both to a water authority and to a water development board in respect of a drought affecting one area. While it might be expected that the water authority could be in the lead in such cases, a board would require an order to allow it to meet any request from the authority for additional supplies. The problem might be that, in case of drought, the water authority would need extra supplies from the Central Scotland water development board, which had huge supplies, and both the water authority and the development board would need a drought order of their own to achieve that.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 27

Short title, commencement and extent

Amendments made: No 11, in page 19, line 45 after '4(2)', insert 'and (4) of this Act'.

No. 12, in page 19, line 45, after '26', insert 'of'.

No. 13, in page 19, line 46, after '11', insert 'to this Act'. —[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Schedule 2

Amendment of Enactments conferring nature conservation functions

Amendment made: No. 14, in page 24, line 35, after '21)', insert ', in subsection (7)(a)'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Schedule 8

Procedure for making drought orders

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 39, line 30, after 'circulating', insert '(i)'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It will be convenient for the House to discuss at the same time Government amendments Nos. 16, 17 and 18.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This series of amendments would add to the advertisement requirements for drought order applications the requirement for an advertisement in the area from which alternative supplies of water are proposed to be taken to meet deficiencies elsewhere. This is appropriate so that those who have an interest in the alternative sources may have an opportunity to raise any objections to the applications.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 16, in page 39, line 31, after 'order', insert '; and

(ii) within any locality from which, in the opinion of the applicant, an alternative supply is likely to be taken,'.

No. 17, in page 40, line 29, after 'place', insert '(i)'.

No. 18, in page 40, line 30, after 'order', insert '; and

(ii) within the locality from which, in the opinion of the applicant, an alternative supply of water is likely to be taken,'. —[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Schedule 10

Miscellaneous Amendments

Mr. Galbraith: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 45, line 12, leave out 'quarter' and insert 'third'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It will be convenient for the House to discuss at the same time the following amendments: No 4, in page 45, line 17, leave out 'quarter' and insert 'third'.

No. 5, in page 45, line 22, leave out 'half' and insert 'third'.

Mr. Galbraith: An aspect that has characterised the Bill has been the amount of cross-party agreement and support for the measure and many of its provisions, and our debates—barring the odd incident such as that which occurred a few moments ago—have been held in good spirit with consideration of each others position. But the provision dealing with the variation and composition of river purification boards is a piece of nasty political spite and represents manoeuvring and gerrymandering by the Government.

The Government intend to reduce the number of local authority representatives on the boards. We are dealing here not simply with an isolated incident but with a pattern that has developed while the Conservatives have been in power. They have gradually been removing the democratically elected representatives on boards, replacing them with their own sycophantic appointees and lackeys. That has been happening to health boards and many other institutions for which the Government have responsibility.

This nasty trend is being continued with river purification boards. The Government have sought, through amendments introduced in Committee, to reduce to a minimum the number of local authority representatives. It has been a case of death by a thousand cuts. We fear that, in due course, the Government will introduce regulations to reduce their numbers still further, until such bodies are stuffed full of Government appointees, those bodies becoming nothing short of rest homes for failed Tory candidates and failed former MPs. Is it nothing more than once again a nasty piece of political spite to try to achieve by subterfuge and devious methods what they cannot do by democratic means?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As the Opposition know, we consulted widely before making the provision. The vast majority of those consulted agreed with us and not with the Opposition on the matter. The change which we intend to make in the proportions of members of river purification boards is linked to our plan also to reduce the size of boards, while nevertheless enabling a wider range of interests to be appointed by the Secretary of State. Clearly, if we have smaller boards but need more places for Secretary of State appointments, we would have to reduce the number of other appointments made. That would mean reducing the numbers appointed by regional and district councils.

I emphasise that our proposals will still make certain that half of each board comprises local authority members. Their contribution is most certainly valued. The other half, although appointed by the Secretary of State, will represent not his interests but, as at present, those of the various groups to which they belong. Indeed, the views of industry, wildlife bodies, ecology interests, commercial fisheries, anglers and others should rightly be heard.

The plans do not add up to centralisation of control; far from it. What they mean is that the river purification boards will be seen to be independent, as they should be, of both central and local government.

I should also mention in relation to the boards that it is important not to erode their independence. Councils are not free to alter the amounts requisitioned by the river purification boards or to transfer those funds to other areas of local authority expenditure; nor are boards accountable to councils as such but ultimately to the Secretary of State. They set their own budgets and make their own decisions. They publish annual reports, and any member of the public is free to take up any matter with any board member directly.

The essence of the matter is that the change has been introduced because the vast majority of responses to consultation supported it.

Amendment negatived.

9.2 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Ian Lang): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am sure that the House is by now very familiar with the main purpose behind the Bill: to establish Scottish Natural Heritage by merging the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland and the Countryside Commission for Scotland. To that end, the Bill provides SNH with general aims and purposes, sets out its various functions and responsibilities and updates particular powers which it will inherit from its predecessor bodies under existing legislation. The House will know that we consider that the Bill offers SNH a positive and flexible framework within which to operate in pursuit of its goal of the improved management and conservation of our precious natural heritage throughout Scotland.

Mr. Dalyell: Having listened patiently, does the Secretary of State agree that, when he talks of goals, the first goal that he and his colleagues will have to consider is the difficult question of the Mar Lodge estate? It is legitimate to ask the Secretary of State, who has heard the exchange, whether he accepts that he has a special responsibility in that matter.

Mr. Lang: I heard the hon. Gentleman's interventions earlier on the matter. I think that it would be inappropriate for me to seek to add anything to what my hon. Friend has already said in reply. Apart from anything else, the matter is not covered by the Bill, which is what we are debating on Third Reading.

There have, of course, been valuable and constructive debates on a number of points at each of the various stages of the Bill, and I am grateful to all hon. Members who contributed to them. We have made a number of important changes to the Bill as a result. We have introduced clause 6, which provides for the opportunity for the establishment of natural heritage areas. We have removed the former clause 11, which would have required SNH to review all existing sites of special scientific interest, with subsequent appeals against continued designation. We have also amended the balancing duty of clause 3 to require SNH to take appropriate account of the conservation of archaeological and historical sites.

We also made some rather technical but nevertheless significant changes to clause 4 to make sure that SNH's relationship to the Joint Nature Conservancy Council will be exactly the same as the NCCS's. A new clause, clause 12, was added to extend to SNH the provisions of part II of the Countryside (Scotland) Act 1967. It will allow the new body, as well as planning authorities, to enter into access agreements or promote access orders designed to allow the public access to open country.

Even more importantly, perhaps, the Bill has given us the chance to discuss the major issues facing Scotland's natural heritage. These include the national parks debate, the principles of the SSSI system, fish farming and forestry. We have also had informed discussions about the importance of a Gaelic name for SNH and, of course, the question of the possible reintroduction of wolves and wild boars.

Hon. Members will also know that parts II and III make important provision for dealing with water resources with regard to irrigation and drought in Scotland. Further provisions on the management of water resources have been introduced during the passage of the Bill—for example, the raising of penalties for certain offences under the Sewerage (Scotland) Act 1968.

I am confident, and have been throughout my involvement with the Bill, that it is a necessary and important step towards the better understanding and use of our natural heritage. With the dedication and commitment of its staff and the co-operation of all those concerned in land use and management,. I believe that SNH will be successful in its aims. I thank hon. Members for the efficient way in which they have dealt with consideration of the Bill, both in Committee and in the Chamber.

I believe that the important amendments which we have made to the Bill in this House are crucial to the proper working of SNH, and I trust that all concerned, including those in another place, will see the wisdom and value of what we are doing by means of the Bill. I commend it to the House.

9.7 pm

Mr. Wilson: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his remarks about the work of the Committee. The Committee's and tonight's proceedings—with a brief blemish from the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark), who has now mercifully departed—were amicable and constructive. We share the aim of improving a Bill to create an agency that will work effectively to achieve the ends for which it is being set up. I have enjoyed the Committee's work and tonight's proceedings and believe that we have a better Bill now than we had at the start. In that spirit, we shall send a message to Scottish Natural Heritage that it is the profound hope of Labour Members that, when it comes into operation, it will do its work well for all the people and the natural inheritance of Scotland which is entrusted to it and to all of us.

I wish to press the Secretary of State once more on the question of Mar Lodge. Clearly, it is at the forefront of the debate in environmental terms. There seems to be wide support for the idea that it should be transferred to some form of public or community ownership. When we can unite an American billionaire, Prince Charles and every environmental organisation in the country, it would be a pity if the Secretary of State were to prove the impediment out of pure apathy. I do not suggest that, of the cast that I have mentioned, I am the most influential, but the Secretary of State would have the full support of the Labour party if he took steps to ensure that the aim of bringing Mar Lodge estate into public ownership was pursued. In deference to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), I should have included the editorial writers of The Daily Telegraph in the list of personalities who support that aim.

Will the Secretary of State make a positive statement on Mar Lodge? There seems to be unanimity in the view that it is very special. It should not return to the vagaries of the marketplace once again, because over the past decade——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. All right hon. and hon. Members present are considerable parliamentarians. They know that Third Reading is a difficult debate, because it concerns only what is now in the legislation. I have been tolerant of the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), who moved far from the amendments, but he cannot press that point now. I should be grateful if he would return to Third Reading.

Mr. Wilson: I mentioned Mar Lodge in the context of Scottish Natural Heritage, which the Bill is creating and in the context of national parks. If Mar Lodge were brought into public ownership, it would immediately become a question——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have given my ruling. The hon. Gentleman will oblige the House and not abuse our procedures.

Mr. Wilson: On the issue of national parks, it is no secret that the Opposition were sympathetic to the idea, and the Government have come forward with a compromise. It is still our view that the Government should have allowed maximum flexibility in each of the areas under pressure. In Committee we had a debate about Loch Lomond, where there is clearly a strong body of opinion that national park status is desirable. Equally, parts of Scotland have been mentioned in the context of the national parks, where there is a general view that what the Government propose to set up and achieve under the Bill may be adequate for their management.

I hope that there will be the maximum possible flexibility within the terms of what has been created. I particularly hope, in deference to to the excellent case made in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) for national park status for Loch Lomond, that resources will be provided to meet the needs of that district. Even if the name "national park" is not used, some of the advantages that would have flown from it being a national park should be available to that part of Scotland which, even now, is under so much pressure.

On the issue of SSSIs, it is worth recalling, because it is now quite a long time ago, that we removed something from the Bill that the other place had introduced. We certainly regarded it—I think that the Government's decision to withdraw it would suggest that they shared our view—as a wrecking amendment, whereby the new agency would have to spend several of its first few years of existence trotting around every existing SSSI to re-designate it. That would have created a high hurdle in terms of an appeals procedure.

The Minister and the hon. Members for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) showed that they sympathised with the idea of an appeals procedure, even where they accepted that the procedure suggested by the Lords was not workable. In Committee, everyone concluded that the proposal introduced in the Lords should be removed, on the understanding that there would be a far healthier process of consultation than some people have experienced under the existing set-up. I am sure that the message could not have gone out any more strongly to Scottish Natural Heritage that, although there is no appeals procedure, there must be maximum sensitivity to the needs and interests of the people who live in regions affected by the designation of SSSIs.

I hope that the Minister will activate the valuable concession that he gave us over forestry, as it affects communities close to districts to be afforested—that a gazette or some other publication will list proposed forestry developments. That will prevent any mystery and ensure that no private forests appear from nowhere without the local community knowing about them. I hope that information will be circulated to organisations such as public libraries, community councils and local authorities. I was grateful for that assurance in Committee, and I hope that the Minister will communicate to me exactly how it will be implemented.

We had a wide range of debates in Committee on the powers that we suggested should be given to the new agency. Those exploratory debates gave us an opportunity to raise the issues of environmental concern in Scotland—fish farming, the movement of shipping in the Minch, the possibility of an oil spillage, forestry and a range of environmental issues. We have concluded that process tonight with our debate on the nuclear possibilities at Dounreay. In every one of those cases, we are happy to take at face value the assurances of the Minister that there is no need to write into the legislation the duty to make representations to the Secretary of State on such matters, because the right to do so is assumed.

I hope that Scottish Natural Heritage will be emboldened by the repeated statements of the Minister that it is expected to make representations on all those contentious issues. We want an environmental organisation with teeth and courage that is prepared to speak on issues, even if it treads on the toes of its political masters or mistresses, irrespective of the party from which they come. It is there to serve not political masters but Scotland's environmental interests. I hope that it will be encouraged by the Minister's clear message that it is expected to do so.

In fairness, I ought to say that, if the Government had wanted to establish a compliant and silent agency, they would not have appointed so high profile a chairman as Magnus Magnusson. That is turning out to be a good appointment, and we wish him well.

We have had a constructive and largely non-political debate. Anything to do with land use and land ownership in Scotland gives rise to debate. For all sorts of reasons, land use and land ownership matter deeply to a wide range of people. There are those who believe that they should not impinge upon the rights of private ownership. Some people would go to very great and arrogant lengths to defend those rights. There are others who will never accept the validity of those rights. Between those two positions, we have to work out a modus vivendi. The Bill lays the foundations for the creation of an agency that will be able to work well in the interests of Scotland and its natural heritage.

In that spirit, I thank in particular the Minister for the courteous way in which he has conducted all the proceedings on the Bill. When it comes into being, we wish the new agency well. We shall work with it, and we hope that it will be a great success.

9.15 pm

Sir Hector Monro: I am delighted that the Bill has completed its proceedings in the House, subject to anything that may happen later. It is a Bill of great vision. I am excited about the future of Scotland's natural heritage. Having been connected with the drafting of the Wildlife and Countryside Bill in 1979 and with taking it through the House, with the help of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and others, and having served on the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland for nine years, I find it slightly paradoxical that I am no longer involved in any official capacity with our natural heritage and that I am very much on the touchline.

The provisions of the Bill will improve and enhance Scotland's heritage. The very best of the Nature Conservancy Council, now in its own Scottish right, coupled with the expertise of the Countryside Commission and the two chairmen, running in harness this year and working closely together to set up Scottish Natural Heritage on 1 April 1992, can do nothing but good. The Secretary of State for Scotland has chosen a man of exceptional calibre to head it. The personnel and resources of the two committees are equally strong. Both organisations will have the back-up of an excellent permanent staff. I have great hope that what we are all so keen on in Scotland—the preservation of our natural heritage—will come about.

The amendments that were debated both in Committee and on Report have demonstrated the great enthusiasm in all parts of the House for preserving Scotland's natural heritage. They have highlighted the fact that, in future, emphasis must be placed upon improving what is already a very good record. We tend to play down our scenery and landscape and our good record on nature conservation and the preservation of wildlife habitats. We are starting from a very sound base. I wish the Secretary of State, the two chairmen and, subsequently, Magnus Magnusson, every good fortune. I am sure that we can look forward to immeasurably improved facilities in Scotland, and I am confident that the Government will provide sufficient resources to ensure that our heritage is maintained and enhanced.

Mr. Maclennan: The Bill did not attract universal acclamation from the environment lobby, and the Government have displayed some political courage in bringing it to the House against the critical view that the Scots should not look after their environment. That was an insulting view which, from the beginning, most Scots rejected.

Most of the main environmental issues have been canvassed during the passage of the Bill, and the concerns that gave rise to a demand for a new Scottish agency were properly ventilated. The Secretary of State responded with some imagination, which I found encouraging, to the concerns in my constituency about the way in which the predecessor organisation had handled the issue of the flow country. The establishment of natural heritage areas under the provisions of clause 6 could provide a way to reconcile the various land interests.

I did not have the good fortune to be a member of the Standing Committee, so I did not have the opportunity to deploy certain arguments. It is right to recognise that the expertise of Scottish Natural Heritage in scientific matters will be the best available, and that there would be no point in having an appeal system. However, as designation will result in the transformation of the status of the land, with consequences of great importance to those who own or occupy the land, and the community that uses it, there should be a requirement for the Secretary of State to confirm the new status. I regret that that is not included in the Bill, but this is not an occasion on which we should linger overlong on what is not included.

My argument was somewhat misrepresented by the Minister at an earlier stage, when it was suggested that my hon. Friends and I wanted an appeal system. We wanted no such thing—we wanted to establish the right of the Secretary of State to intervene when designation could have adverse consequences. I think that that was a legitimate objective. If clause 6 is to be the way ahead, it is possible that conflict will not arise. That will depend on how Scottish Natural Heritage uses the power of designation of sites of special scientific interest. If it goes full steam ahead and designates large tracts of Scotland, rather than using the proposals in clause 6, I predict that there will be conflict.

We should have a clear statement, not about consultation—we have already had that from Magnus Magnusson and his colleagues—but about the policy intention on widespread designation. The Secretary of State has admitted that that power was used in the absence of any other power, for purposes that the House did not envisage when the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 was enacted. I think that that is the view of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who has a closer knowledge of, and involvement in, the matter than any other hon. Member. No one wants to see a continuation of past conflicts.

Clause 6 provides for sites of special scientific interest that have already been designated in pursuance of the objectives that the clause would cover. I do not accept the view of some that for the next few years, the agency should reconsider all designations because that would be damaging to its role. However, there may be a case for it reconsidering designations in some sectors that would be better covered by the procedures set out in clause 6. It would be extremely sensible for the agency to place a moratorium on the designation of sites of special scientific interest in the flow countries, especially while it contemplates the use of powers that allow representations to be made about the economic impact of what is proposed and, ultimately, for the Secretary of State to decide what is the best way to proceed. I appeal to Magnus Magnusson to issue a clear statement that there will be a moratorium pending consideration of the powers that are set out in clause 6.

In other respects, I welcome the Bill as a strengthening of the protection of our environment in Scotland. I believe that the interest of the Scottish people in seeing that environment improved and protected is one that everyone in the House who has participated in debates on the Bill has sought to reflect, and that that approach is reflected in the shape of the Bill as it has emerged following consideration on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report. The Bill has been improved because the Government have responded to suggestions and listened to criticisms. We can take some pride and satisfaction in the fact that the House has agreed to the setting up of a new institution that will bring together the work of two former agencies. The redefining of the roles of those agencies will give a sharper cutting edge to the work that is so important to our country.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) referred to what can be described as the in-house matters of dealing with those who wish to appeal against decisions that will be made under clause 6. The clause does not provide for a particularly happy system. I spoke at some length on the issue in Committee, but I shall not do so this evening. If the matter is not taken up in the other place, I believe that we shall return to it in future.

I shall be astonished if Scottish Natural Heritage does not behave in an understanding and sympathetic way. I am sure that it will engage in consultations that will be different from those that have taken place in the past. I hope that that will happen, but all my experience is that bureaucratic bodies, despite all the good wishes of Parliament, have a tendency to develop what I call god-like postures after they have been in existence for some time. With that fear in mind, I tabled an amendment, as did other hon. Members.

I shall be surprised if the matter is not canvassed when the Bill is considered in another place. I am fairly sure that those in the other place will debate it. Whatever happens finally to the Bill, I believe that the system that is set out in clause 6 will constantly be considered.

However, this is an important and substantial Bill for Scotland. It will change things in many ways and for the better. We all hope that we will care for, use properly, look after and make use of our natural heritage. By "we", I mean the Scots and all those who visit Scotland. We can certainly say that we have given our children and our children's children a basis on which they can look forward to enjoying the delights and beauty of beautiful Scotland.

9.29 pm

Mr. McFall: Some hon. Members have said that the Bill has received universal acclamation, but it certainly does not have it from me. The mountain areas of Scotland and consultation management have not been addressed, and in the years to come the problems will pile up, particularly in my area.

Clause 2 deals with the functions of Scottish Natural Heritage. People in my area are crying out for legislative proposals so that the issues affecting the Loch Lomond area can be addressed. It is manifest that the present arrangements whereby local authorities come together are not working effectively and will not work in the long term. I plead with the Minister and with Magnus Magnusson the chairman-designate, to take into consideration, with the working party which the Minister kindly offered me, that legislative aspect and the crucial aspect of funding.

The Bill does not address funding. As I said in Committee, we have national parks for England and Wales and Government funding of 80 per cent. In a current White Paper, the Department of the Environment calls the national parks of England and Wales the jewels in the crown. We do not have that. The comparison with England and Wales is bad enough, but in a European and international context we are the odd man out. We are very much the poor relation.

The Minister has done nothing to enhance the environment of my area. The Scottish Council for National Parks has recently been re-established. It mentions in a communication sent to us that natural heritage areas are intended to be substitutes for national parks, and I agree. That is based on the voluntary principle. But the voluntary principle has to date failed to take care of the environment. If the Minister comes to Loch Lomond with me this summer, he will see the effects and inadequacies of the voluntary principle, and the need for a solution for Loch Lomond. That is not on offer from the Government at the moment.

The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) said that bureaucracies have a way of their own and become godlike. I fear that the NHA has been set in concrete and that there will be nothing good on offer for my area. That is the worry in my area.

I said in Committee that there was a manifest agreement among community groups in my area about the desirability of national park status. Rural community councils like Callender, which is not in my constituency but in the constituency of the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), voted strongly to be included in the national park area. I have received no adverse comments on the issue of the national park status and I would like the Minister to tell us about any comments he has had from people on that subject.

A letter dated 3 December 1990 from Magnus Magnusson, the chairman of the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland, to the Countryside Commission says:

"The status of the designation and its protective powers should be commensurate with the relative importance of the areas in Europe or wider international term.."

How can natural heritage areas come within the European or international context when they are not established along the lines of national parks, when they do not have independent planning or adequate funding? That is the first issue that Magnus Magnusson and his colleagues will have to address. In the same letter, Magnus Magnusson said:

"The budget allocated to the area must be adequate for reasonable attainment of priorities determined for the overall management of the area."

That is not happening.

In my letter to the Minister on 5 April 1991—which I am sure he has received—I said that the constituent local authorities for Loch Lomond regional park are dismayed at the latest exercise with regard to a working party. I have reason to believe that we shall not get far with that. A communication from Dumbarton district council tells me that it has been informed that in correspondence with the Scottish Office the working party's remit is to consider how improvements may be achieved within the existing statutory and administrative framework; and that there is a current school of thought which believes that the working party would be at officer level only.

One important aspect of any working party is that it should represent local interest and involve local authority and community representatives. It is local authority, community and voluntary representatives who know their own areas. It is no use leaving it to those at officer level. There must be input from the local community or the problems of the area will not be considered in their entirety.

Natural heritage areas are inadequate for Loch Lomond, as are the voluntary principle, the lack of funding and the lack of planning powers. I tell the Minister that tonight and I will tell him that for years to come. There is a huge body of Scottish environmental opinion behind me, because the need for enhancement and conservation for a strategy for land management for the mountain areas of Scotland is important. The Bill does not deal with those issues. I welcome it as a little step forward, but it has had almost fatal flaws from the beginning. Even at this stage, I ask the Minister to reconsider the Bill when it returns from another place and to listen to the people in Scotland because I am speaking for many of them. I ask the Minister to respond to local feelings and, when the Bill returns to the House, to give us some of the tools with which properly to manage our land and our heritage.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: There was an enormous contrast between the speech of the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) and that of the Secretary of State for Scotland, who believes the Bill to be perfect in every way. It is not perfect, but it has been improved since it arrived in the House by, for example, the fateful disappearance of the notorious clause 11.

However, there are still massive gaps in the Bill, for example, on the dumping of nuclear and toxic waste and on the concept or clear definition of sustainability. I hope that the Minister's promise about community involvement will be fulfilled in practice. I notice that there is a major gap in the Bill on the question of land use in Scotland. I hope that the House will deal with such topics in the future.

The Bill is at least a step towards a co-ordinated view of the Scottish environment and has at least attempted to create an integrated approach to Scottish environmental needs. If Mr. Magnusson's promises are fulfilled, I hope that we shall see a decentralised approach in which, as far as possible, there will be a decentralisation of decision taking and contact with local communities.

I am disappointed that, although there has been an improvement in the Bill, that improvement is partial and under-powered compared to the Scottish environmental protection agency that I should like to see in an ideal and independent Scotland. At least the Bill is a small step in the right direction. I should like to wish Magnus Magnusson and the staff of the Scottish Natural Heritage well in their work. Their task will not be easy, but it will be of massive importance to the future of Scotland.

9.38 pm

Mr. Kennedy: I do not propose to interrupt the running order, and I shall be brief.

Mr. Galbraith: Good.

Mr. Kennedy: It is typical of the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) to shatter the all-party consensus which was emerging in the closing stages. I want to make a contribution now, as I was not a member of the Committee. As Wester Ross featured heavily in the discussions of national parks, I should like to say a couple of words, almost in contrast to the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall).

I shall begin with an opening principle. The beauty of the legislation—if it works—is that stated by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson). It has within it a degree of flexibility which, if it is to succeed and to perform well in the years ahead, means that it can come up with a variety of different solutions based on the realities of different communities and different parts of Scotland. That must be a strength.

The weakness of the argument for the level of community responsiveness and the different working blueprint for different areas is that if one is not careful one ends up with anarchy. No one has angled seriously for that for our natural heritage and conservation. I want to go back to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). We must recognise that the argument of the hon. Member for Dumbarton for a national park, independent planning and proper resourcing may be the blueprint for Loch Lomond, given its proximity to the conurbation of west central Scotland and to Glasgow in particular, but it would not fit easily or acceptably in the context of Wester Ross, which is a rather different environment.

Mr. McFall: In Committee, I tabled various new clauses with specific reference to Loch Lomond. I made the point then that different solutions are required for different areas. I said that the sensitivities of people in the area had to be upheld. I was speaking about my own area.

Mr. Kennedy: I was aware of that point, and that is why I am only too pleased to be able to speak in the hon. Gentleman's support. He obviously speaks with more local working knowledge of Loch Lomond than I can and he makes a powerful case. However, the same case may not apply to other areas, whether the Cairngorms or Wester Ross.

My next point is for the Minister, although it might now be made more appropriately to Magnus Magnusson. Highland regional council is very much encouraged by Mr. Magnusson's approach and by his attitude to the post. He has visited various parts of the Highland region, and he has had some contact with the regional authority and with people at local level. He is sensitive to the anxieties involved.

In the whole saga of sites of special scientific interest, as other hon. Members know only too well, there has been anxiety about an imposed national park in part of the highlands. The tremendous anxiety that has followed from that is that people from outside the area will call the shots. It is feared that there may even be no shots to be called because an iron curtain will be drawn around the area and no development in the local interest will be allowed. That is a genuine anxiety, which Mr. Magnusson appreciates. The Bill sets out a framework that will allow him sufficient flexibility, subject to the guidance of the Scottish Office, to produce an environmental policy that can square that difficult circle—to protect and promote the indigenous natural beauty while not stifling it. The aim should be to enable future generations to make a livelihood from the area as the present generation can.

One of the most encouraging features of the constituency postbag—I am sure that hon. Members of all parties find the same—is the tremendous increase in the number of schoolchildren who now write to Members of Parliament. Hon. Members who have served in the House for decades longer than I have have also registered that. I find that, apart from the broad global issues such as the third world, schoolchildren increasingly write to Members of Parliament about environmental issues.

In the highland context, I hope that that demonstrates an awareness of the importance of the natural environment. It also shows that those who are being born, brought up and educated within that environment have a sensible sensitivity to the need to enhance it and at the same time to the need to be able to promote development in the area which will be for their future well-being as regards job opportunities. That means that one does not want to turn the highlands into a natural history museum with the presumption that people will not be able to live and make a livelihood there, but wants to ensure that the livelihood conforms as much as possible to the natural environment.

Given all the slings and arrows of fortune that have on occasion been fired against highlanders, they have done a pretty good job of being responsible about the environment while exploiting it, in the proper sense of the word, for their future well-being.

I hope that the Minister, the Scottish Office and Magnus Magnusson will be extremely careful in any moves that they might make to designate natural heritage areas. We do not want to end up with the sort of national park blueprint that might well suit Loch Lomond but would not be the right solution to achieve a balance between conservation and development in Wester Ross and other parts of the highlands.

9.46 pm

Mr. Dalyell: An 11-year-old wrote to me inquiring:

"How come a person in Mr. Magnus Magnusson's position could possibly be in favour of whaling. Answer that."

I am still contemplating the reply, because I am not sure that there is one.

Mr. Wilson: Pass.

Mr. Dalyell: Pass. During the recess, I heard you say, Mr. Speaker, on "The Week in Westminster" that the best Members of Parliament were the most unreasonable.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but I said "not too unreasonable".

Mr. Dalyell: I am being reasonably unreasonable, when I say that I think that Third Reading is certainly a time for politenesses, but also a time to talk to the House of Lords if one wants to, because they will have to consider the Bill further.

As regards politeness, the Minister has certainly been a model of courtesy and decency in Committee, and I must couple that with the courtesy that I have received from his office and from other officials of the Scottish Office on the many occasions that I have had dealings with them. I have no doubts of the seriousness of purpose of both the Minister and his officials. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) who was Chairman of the Committee.

I am deeply discontented by what we have done. There are geological flaws in the Bill. During the recess, I reflected carefully on exactly what we have been up to. As I see it, the position is this. The Government have enacted legislation to create an independent Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland. To be fair, there is merit in placing in the hands of the Secretary of State for Scotland a clear responsibility for the conservation of Scotland's wildlife and for ensuring that nature conservation has a full place in the debate about land use in Scotland.

However the cost of that change has been high in disruption of the scientific conservation effort, in the alienation of much informed opinion on conservation and in the loss of morale among concerned and involved staff.

Perhaps the first geological fault is that landscape and wildlife conservation simply are not compatible bedmates: they do not go together. The Government's proposals for mergers postulate that landscape and wildlife conservation are natural partners for merger. We need to ask whether that proposition is appropriate for functions of different origins, approaches and ethics. Those differences are important.

The roots of landscape conservation lie in planning for the built environment and concern to conserve the designed and man-made landscape structure of much of our countryside. That is an aesthetic approach. Nature conservation has its origins in study of natural history and its practice is underpinned by scientific survey and assessment. That is an ecological approach. Each has a different ethos, and different training, skills and legislation. Those fundamentals simply cannot be set aside in a shifting around of our administrative arrangements for delivery of conservation advice.

There is no right or wrong way in which to arrange these matters. Other countries do things differently. But it is facile to set aside the experience and structures which have evolved over a long period without any debate about whether they are right. We all know the genesis of the Bill. It was thought up by the former Environment Secretary and dispatched to the House of Commons.

A case could be made for a close alliance between landscape conservation and protection systems for historic landscapes and the built heritage. Here might lie an alternative alliance of interest in the way in which man has fashioned and continues to fashion the appearance of our land.

The Minister might ask his advisers on the Historic Buildings Council for Scotland for its views on that proposition. It has concluded that a convincing case for the linking of landscape and nature conservation functions has not been made. Far less do the proposals address the mechanics of integration. A merger, in the full sense of that word, is not realistic. The best that can be done is to staple functions together.

In my opinion, for the most part we have created elaborate window dressing. Scottish Natural Heritage is not either more powerful or more effective than its predecessor.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman is making an interesting speech. We may not be creating a body which is any more powerful, but at least we are creating a body in which the two interests that he rightly described as rather different can be reconciled. Is not that a way of producing a coherent approach to the land?

Mr. Dalyell: I am not sure about that. My candid response to the hon. Gentleman is that I have to recognise that he had an unfortunate experience in his constituency with nature conservancy in the flow country. A good deal of tactlessness was involved, and Sir William Wilkinson and his colleagues regretted what happened. For reasons of time, I would rather not be drawn into discussing that interesting and important point. In all honesty, I could not tell the hon. Gentleman that he is wrong. That is not the position that I wish to take.

In the Government's earlier consultative paper about merger, "The Way Ahead", little attention was paid to the commission's recreation function. This is dismaying, because recreation is at the centre in the commission's business and it commands a significant portion of the grant that the commission disburses to its client groups in the public and private sectors. The lack of attention to recreation is alarming on several grounds.

First, for too long we have under-invested in recreation in the countryside and extra new resources are required to manage the impacts of the public use of land and to promote higher quality facilities, all of which underpin the recreation and tourism industries. This is one of the essential arguments in the commission's mountain areas report, as the Minister will concede.

Secondly, the commission promotes its recreation functions through investment and working with others, operating almost as a development agency, and funds for this approach will be less secure after merger, given the wide prospectus of new conservation initiatives proposed for the new agency.

Thirdly, the Government's consultation paper identifies recreation as a potential threat to conservation. Indeed, recreation is seen as a problem, not an opportunity—a perception that is likely to lead to recreation becoming subordinate to conservation, if carried forward.

I hope even at this stage that the Lords will reflect on these points.

Enjoyment by the public extends across the whole of our heritage, be it scenery, wildlife, the built and historic, or cultural matters. The assessment and care of heritage involve many organisations concerned with land use, planning and management. The Commission's functions for enjoyment and care of fine scenery are well balanced, because scenery is the prime attraction for most visitors to the countryside and is central to tourism. The countryside is also the resource and the backdrop for many sporting activities.

A time when the tempo of interest in leisure use of the countryside is on the increase is not the time to be playing down recreation. Nor is the time to be placing this function in a new agency where it will inevitably be in a more subordinate role because of the dominance of staff and legislation concerned with nature conservation. Any underplaying of recreation will be regarded as controversial by recreation interests and will be likely to lead to new controversy and conflict.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman is making a very important speech and certainly many of us would have wished that we could have heard some of it earlier. That is not a criticism; it is just a comment.

On the very point of recreation bodies that have an interest in the use of a our Scottish land, does the hon. Gentleman join me in deploring the absence of proper appeals procedure, which is the point I tried to make in Committee, he will remember?

Mr. Dalyell: I was, as my hon. Friends know, very tempted when the hon. Gentleman approached me to support him on appeals. I did not do so. I took a lot of trouble about it. I asked around, and a number of those with whom I was in close contact were against the appeals procedure precisely because they thought that it might be abused. It did not help his case that Lord Pearson and others in the Lords had conducted this ambush. This is my personal opinion—I cannot speak for my hon. Friends on the Front Bench and they may take a different view—but had it not been for what happened in the Lords, the hon. Gentleman would have got his amendment through. But great resentment was caused by what happened in the Lords on this issue.

Mr. Walker: What about the Committee?

Mr. Dalyell: I think that the Minister will agree that, with the exception of himself, I probably occupied more of the Committee's time than anybody.

During the recess, I reflected on this matter with colleagues, who have been very helpful, with a view to making a submission to the House of Lords to think again. I make no bones about what I should like to see happening. I should like to see a general election in June, so that we could go back to the drawing board on this whole matter. In fact, I should like to see the Bill fall.

We have to reflect on the whole question of sustainable development and whether it can be delivered. By far the most interesting element of the new proposals is the emphasis on sustainable development. The Government's desire to move in this direction is to be welcomed, but the realism of laying this task on the new agency needs examination.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Natural Heritage (Scotland) Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Mr. Dalyell: First, there is the question whether the new agency is centrally enough placed to handle this major challenge. The central conservation issues of today pivot on the consumption—particularly by the developed nations—of increasing amounts of the world's natural resources, and on all the consequent effects on pollution, population increase, health, hunger and the social cohesion of increasingly urbanised societies.

This is a heady agenda, on which a local agency with a limited remit might make progress. It can be argued that the scale of these issues places them at governmental or transnational level, although there is an important challenge here for a body to act in a missionary role. But this will be a provocative task, if only in defining, in a practical way, what sustainable development means. This will not necessarily lead to the kind of harmony that the Government seek in the debate about conservation and development.

The concept of sustainable development is, on the one hand, simple and, because of this, attractive. But it is also difficult to define and difficult to apply to the kind of marginal land that makes up much of upland Scotland. Let me give some examples.

We cannot easily assess whether present approaches to the management of rural land are sustainable, because of the long time scale involved in understanding the effects of present practice, and because of the complexity of the systems—for example, the debate on whether conifer afforestation of poor, acidic upland soils leads to enhanced acidification. The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) knows exactly what I am getting at, as it is highly pertinent to the kind of area that he represents.

In the assessment of gains and losses in the use of land, we cannot easily measure, or give monetary value to, the intangible benefits or values that we attach to, say, well-being and pride in our heritage, or to the enjoyment of recreation in fine countryside. It is unlikely that there is any methodology to do this with precision.

At this stage I want to pay tribute to a man I admire very much. I refer to George Lawson, a former Member of Parliament for Motherwell, and a Scottish Whip. He gave a great deal of his time to the question of land use, and published a report. I do not say that I have read the entire report, but during the recess I went back to it. I thought extremely highly of the work that George Lawson did.

It is likely that we have already passed the limits of sustainable use in the way in which we exploit land of the lowest productivity—say, in the afforestation of the very poorest land, or in the carrying capacity of some upland habitats for recreation.

So, while the sustainable development remit is attractive, it is not an easy route forward for any agency whose remit does not extend into a wide arena, and vigorous pursuit if this theme is likely to sharpen the conservation-development debate, not ease it.

The Government have made it clear that the proposed new agency must temper its functions with economic developments in rural areas. That is not quite in accord with the definition of sustainable development in which human activities should be in balance with the capacity of the natural resources being used. The dilemma here is that the Government's approach to balancing duties places undue burdens on the lightweight and lowly funded conservation bodies as against the heavily resourced mechanisms for the support of the development.

Yet evidence is lacking that conservation is a major constraint on development in Scotland. No such accusation can be made against the way in which the conservation of landscape has been delivered. For wildlife conservation, there has been a small number of high-profile cases of conflict, but that should not obscure the fact that most SSSI consultations, most management agreements and most other consultation arrangements for conservation are working smoothly. Any snags in the system should be eased through improvements in its administration rather than in its wholesale reorganisation.

My ferocious defence of the NCC staff against accusations in the debate in the other place by people who should have known better was partly due to the fact that the NCC staff as a whole, with certain exceptions—the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) referred to some unfortunate exceptions—had been very successful. It should be on the record that the NCC staff as a whole were deeply hurt by what was said in the debate in the other place. I say that having attended the estuary and other NCC presentations given by Sir William Wilkinson and Tim Hornsby.

Mr. McFall: I suggest to my hon. Friend that the people who have been betrayed are the members of the Countryside Commission, with their mountain areas report. My hon. Friend is making important points about development and conservation. In the Loch Lomond area, there is £120 million-worth of development, but we do not have the necessary statutory laws for conservation and enhancement. The result is that, on the see-saw, the balance is very much on the side of development. Interest in conservation and the enhancement of the environment is negligible compared with the pressure for development.

Mr. Dalyell: I do not exaggerate when I say that, of the 30 to 40 mostly knowledgeable people I have met who read the Official Report of the debates that took place in Committee, and in particular who read the remarks of my hon. Friend, most said, in effect, "John McFall is absolutely right, and you people in Parliament had better understand that." I refer not only to Frank Bracewell, the planning officer of Central regional council, but many others who strongly agree with the proposal put forward by my hon. Friend, who is the constituency Member involved.

I leave out the rest of the argument. My hon. Friend the Member for the Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) may be right in what he said about his area, and we do not quarrel with that, but some of us in the Central region desperately want a natural park. The whole tenor of the Government's proposals is to undermine the role of nature conservation and to give encouragement to the prejudiced view that the nature conservation movement must be brought to heel. That is nothing less than a major surrender of values. Adding to the commission's functions may be seen by some as one way of shifting the balance against nature conservation, but it is no way to create a workable merger. The early signs are that the merger is not working happily. The planning stage and the rest of what is going on are riddled with difficulties.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): We all acknowledge my hon. Friend's expertise in the matter, but is it not the case that one of the tragedies of the Government's approach is that the vested interests—landowners, and worse, those people who have only a financial interest in lands in Scotland, who may not be based in Scotland and who may not have any concern for the conservation of land in Scotland—seem to be listened to in the corridors of power rather than the hill walkers, the bird watchers and the other conservation groups who for over a century have had the real interest of Scotland at heart? Does my hon. Friend agree that, by his approach, the Minister is prejudicing the interests of people who enjoy, relish and have a great commitment to land and conservation in Scotland in favour of the interests of those who have only a financial interest? That is the nub of the difference between us and the Minister.

Mr. Dalyell: I shall not stretch Mr. Speaker's patience by wandering to the question of Mar Lodge. The earlier discussion of Mar lodge completely encapsulated the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) had made. That is why we will talk about Mar Lodge on other occasions, but I undertook not to stray back to that.

There are organisational imbalances to address in the merger. Those imbalances might be catalogued. There is a major imbalance in staff numbers, with the NCCS at the time of merger being at least six times larger. The organisation will be starting life essentially in the old offices of the NCCS, but with a new nameplate, so there will be an image issue which will run against the interests of the Countryside Commission for Scotland. The NCCS has complex and well focused legislation on designation, control licensing, land management, and so on, and those functions will still have to be delivered, while the commission's functions under statute are relatively open, and will be overshadowed by the need to achieve these key wildlife tasks. There is a very vigorous voluntary sector lobby on behalf of nature conservation, which will be pushing hard for no relaxation in the way in which nature conservation is delivered. Far from being a true merger of equals, the prospect is that the CCS functions will become overshadowed in the new arrangement.

We have a complex system for administering and overseeing land use matters. Some people think that there should be an all-embracing land use department, but there are good arguments against whole scale amalgamation of functions. Principally, the key sectoral interests should be seen to be separate and visible, without the concealment of debate that would exist in an all-purpose land-use department where controversy was balanced internally. The all-purpose approach would be bureaucratic and less efficient.

Maintaining two Government agencies would allow those functions that may be subordinated to have their place and to be visible—as in the case of recreation—to the large constituency with an interest in it. Objectives would be more focused; indeed, divergence of views on matters like conservation is to be encouraged, as fostering debate and providing the widest spectrum of views to Government. The risk of subordinating key functions is the key argument in the White Paper "This Common Inheritance" against an equivalent merger in England, and one has to ask why that argument does not apply in Scotland.

The new agency, SNH, already promises to be a small bureaucracy, with complex systems of political control and oversight. The Minister may interrupt if he thinks that I am being unfair, but there are those dangers.

Less dramatic but more cost effective, more efficient and saving of confusion and morale would be to address any need for change through administrative action. To do that, the Government should endorse the present structures as the basis for change, and encourage administrative fine-tuning of existing mechanisms where snagging points occur, such as the need for a route of appeal when promoting new designated areas.

They should provide some of the extra resources required for the merger with the relatively underfunded

[Mr. Dalyell]

Countryside Commission for Scotland and should direct that its two agencies collaborate closely on those topics where joint working makes good sense. They should promote and strengthen the commission's work in the countryside around towns where it has already made an impact and, with major dereliction now tackled by the Scottish Development Agency, direct the commission to a new role in leading smaller scale landscape improvement work in collaboration with the local enterprise companies to create a richer and more accessible landscape close to where most Scots live.

The Government should also encourage the commission to continue to develop a stronger design-based approach in its work, particulary to promote higher standards of built development in the countryside. They should release more funding to the commission to strengthen its work to promote recreation and facilitate harmony between visitors and those who own and work the land.

Finally, the Government should encourage stronger working between the conservation agencies and those agencies and Departments responsible for primary land uses. They should begin a debate about sustainable use as a collaborative venture in that way rather than through a single agency approach as proposed.

Underfunding of the Countryside Commission in recent years has left it in a weaker position than the Nature Conservancy Council because the commission's mode of working through others has led to it spend little of its resources on building up its own staff and internal activities. Although small in size, the commission has operated efficiently and prudently and chosen partnership as its main working theme. The extent of duplication of effort between the commission and the NCC is limited, and that could be eased by more collaboration.

There is a role for an agency to link caring for the countryside and its use for recreation. That is not always an appreciated role because it involves bridge-building and compromise as well as avoidance of confrontation. Recently, however, the commission has been leading lively debates on issues like caring better for mountain areas, and has been reviewing arrangements for access to the countryside.

Given a modest increase in staff and funding, the commission could play a more vigorous role and develop a distinctive approach to enjoyment and conservation of Scotland's scenery, which is the crucial resource underpinning tourism and outdoor recreation.

There has been little general debate about the technical merits of the proposed merger of the CCS and the NCC in Scotland. In part, some people may see the merger as simply a good way to simplify public administration. Some may see it as providing a new face to conservation, while others undoubtedly see the merger as a means of blunting what is perceived to be a sharp edge to conservation. But there must be a serious review of fundamentals and practicability.

I hope that the House of Lords will reconsider the Bill thoroughly, as it is entitled to do. Having read the Official Report of the Standing Committee, I hope that, saved by the gong in the form of a general election, the Labour party will put forward different proposals from the ill-thought-out, ill-conceived and exceedingly expensive Conservative party proposals, which will cause a great deal of hassle.

Mr. Galbraith: I shall put everyone's mind at rest by reassuring them that I have no intention of following that tour de force, but shall simply make a few closing remarks.

I have spent the last part of my life in the mountains, and I have a love affair with the mountains and the countryside—in other words, Scottish Natural Heritage, which is what the Bill is about. Therefore, I was pleased to be part of the process of taking the Bill through its stages, along with the courteous Under-Secretary of State.

The merger between the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council is a natural one. On that I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). There are conflicting functions within the organisations, but both establishments are concerned with the good use, management and preservation of the countryside. The conflicts are best dealt with when taken together in a committee rather than being set apart, which often generates false conflicts.

My first contact with the Nature Conservancy Council was during my visits to the Isle of Rhum, which I have already mentioned. The council has always been a delight to me and others, and looks after that island very well; access to it is free and easy, and I have never had any problems. Its management of that island is an excellent example of just what the Nature Conservancy Council can do. Therefore, all in the House can trust in an organisation constituted, in part, by the Nature Conservancy Council to provide good management and ensure the preservation of the countryside in the mountain regions of Scotland. Therefore, I wish the new organisation well. It has the full-hearted support of Opposition Members.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I agree with the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) that the Bill enjoyed a good Committee stage, and that Magnus Magnusson will be a dedicated, conscientious and determined chairman of the new organisation and willl make a complete success of it.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) has participated as he started this theme with the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. As he said, the Bill provides great hope and possibilities.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has a particular interest in environmental matters. I have been unable to convince him on the justification of merging the two organisations, but I think it is fair to say that the House as a whole welcomes that proposal—most Scottish Members of Parliament do. I certainly agreed with what the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) said on that issue. As the hon. Member for Linlithgow well knows, we amended the Bill with regard to the built heritage.

I believe that we have created a stronger environmental agency in practice that will make more use of existing mechanisms. To the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) I say that the working party will be established before long. As a first step, we have commissioned review papers from the relevant interested parties on the issues facing the management of the region and what should be done.

To my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) I say that the new organisation will have to operate with much more sensitivity in relation to future non-statutory appeals.

The protection and conservation of landscape and wildlife are closely linked and cannot be separated from access and enjoyment of the countryside. We believe that an integrated approach by one agency will provide a more effective means of stimulating the sustainable use of Scotland's natural heritage. The new agency will maintain and extend the work of both organisations, building on their existing strengths and staff expertise. We expect Scottish Natural Heritage to bring about changes in attitude towards conservation and the enjoyment of Scotland's natural heritage. With its network of offices throughout Scotland and its regional structure, it will be well placed to play a responsive and sensitive role.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow raised a number of issues, including recreation. I shall be happy to respond to him in detail later. I think that that is probably the best way to proceed because he raised a large number of issues relating to structure.

The agency will be a much stronger environmental organisation and will be greatly in Scotland's interests. I thank hon. Members for participating in our debates on the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: I do not expect any answers tonight, but I would ask for a letter to reflect the careful consideration that will be given to the matter.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman will most certainly receive the answers, but I again stress that this will be a much stronger environmental agency for Scotland.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

PETITION

10.24 pm

Mr. Ken Hargreaves (Hyndburn): I wish to present a petition to the House on behalf of the residents of Great Harwood. The petition expresses concern at the introduction of a traffic management scheme in the Park road and St. Hubert's road areas of Great Harwood, which residents feel is not only inconvenient but may result in an increase in the number of accidents. They feel that there is great danger to children and old people.

The residents feel aggrieved because they consider that they were not properly consulted and that their views were not taken into account by local councillors and Hyndburn borough council before thousands of pounds were wasted on a scheme that will increase the danger, spoil the environment and cause inconvenience to residents and loss of trade to businesses. They say:

We object to the traffic ramps in St. Hubert's road, Park road and the surrounding area. There is no parking space for residents and there is no indication whether pedestrians or motorists have right of way.

The petition continues:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House do urge the Secretary of State for Transport to review the traffic management scheme in St. Hubert's road and Park road and the surrounding area in Great Harwood, taking into account the views of local residents, and to bring forward improved proposals. And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Orpington Hospital

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

10.25 pm

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Orpington hospital has its origins in a military hospital built with prefabricated buildings by the Canadian army for its troops during the first world war. Over the years, it has grown so that now it has, in addition to many of the original buildings, modern residential staff accommodation, a social centre and a substantial modern block, completed in 1982 at a cost of £9 milion and known as the Canada wing. It includes twin operating theatres and 264 of the hospital's 354 beds. The Canada wing is the most modern fabric of the entire Bromley health district, with all facilities for acute patient care. The entire hospital stands on a site of 38·8 acres, of which 12 are green fields. There is ample room for expansion. The whole site lies just off the A21, a main artery from London to Kent and the Channel ports, and only two miles from the M25.

The existing official plan for the hospital's future, as approved by the Government some years ago, is that it should be further developed into a modern district general hospital, providing all acute services and a full-time, 24-hour accident and emergency service, to serve the needs of the southern half of the London borough of Bromley and adjacent areas in Kent. The southern half is the growing half of the borough. The northern half is intended to be served by the expansion of Bromley hospital, a cottage-hospital style building presently standing on a site of only nine acres in urban Bromley.

The area served by the local health authority is coterminous with the London borough of Bromley. Besides Orpington and Bromley hospitals, it includes hospital buildings in Farnborough, Beckenham and Cane Hill. The object of the officially approved plan was to rationalise hospital services in the health authority area by concentrating acute services on the two main sites.

So far, so good. The Canada wing represented phase 2 of the development plan for Orpington hospital. My constituents and I were looking forward to the completion of the third phase, projected for next year, when it was anticipated that all the old hutted accommodation would be replaced and the rest of the services appropriate to a modern general hospital would be added. Successive Ministers in this House have assured me that Orpington hospital will retain its place in the plan.

However, we reckoned without the bureaucrats, administrative and medical, who have now screwed up that prospect and left us in a situation where the hospital is reduced to a shadow of what it could and should be: its status for the purpose of professional training removed, its provision for general surgery and intensive care withdrawn, its accident and emergency service, even on the scale of a minor injuries unit, abolished, its professional staff leaving and the morale of those remaining at its lowest.

The community health council has unanimously passed a vote of censure on the health authority. The general manager of the health authority, like his predecessor, has left to go further up the hierarchy, and the chairman has left office in somewhat mysterious circumstances. Both posts are now vacant. How the authority got into that mess is instructive. In 1987, the planners got it into their heads that the site of the existing Bromley hospital—nine acres—was too small to allow it to expand into a district general hospital to serve the northern half of the borough of Bromley.

They therefore proposed a deal—fashionable in those Thatcherite days—whereby the private sector could help to pay for the cost of a mammoth new hospital for all the acute services in the borough to replace both Bromley and Orpington hospitals. The new building, housing 820 beds and with parking space for 1,000 cars, would cost £100 million, which the planners of both the health authority and the borough council expected to raise by selling to private developers the surplus land at the other hospitals, which would be reduced to providing back-up services.

The idea would mean the death of Orpington hospital as my constituents know it. The prospect of the loss of that marvellous hospital on their doorsteps and journeying six to eight miles into Bromley is anathema to us all. Unfortunately, those in the north of the borough who formerly relied on Bromley hospital found the idea attractive, and they provide a majority on the council and on the health authority. The medical professionals also liked the idea, for they thought that it would mean greater opportunities for higher professional standards. The site proposed, which is owned by the borough council, is 21 acres of open space in the centre of the borough, where the traffic is often congested.

The idea seemed unstoppable when I raised the matter in the House on 30 October 1989. The then Under-Secretary of State for Health—my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman)—agreed that his predecessors had given me assurances about the future of Orpington hospital. He was sceptical about the chances of £100 million being raised for the scheme, but he did not want to intervene then. However, there was a hitch. The site for that massive piece of concrete jungle was in the green belt. It appears to be incredible that that fact was overlooked by the planners, but it was.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment called in the planning application. His inspector reported, inter alia, in paragraph 55 of his report:

> "I have come to the conclusion that whereas there is an undoubted need for new hospital provision in Bromley, the circumstances are not so very special as to overcome the strong presumption against inappropriate development in the Green Belt. There are to my mind other possible forms of development elsewhere which could achieve most of the objectives being pursued by the Health Authority."

He also reported in paragraph 22:

> "My conclusion on the evidence available is that the best prospect of locating the proposed new hospital elsewhere would be to combine a small development at the existing Bromley hospital site with a large development at Orpington".

So planning consent for the super-hospital was rightly refused. Green fields are especially precious in urban areas such as central Bromley.

Unwisely, the person who wrote to Bromley council to convey the decision of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment stated that the refusal was because the site was in the green belt and that there would be no objection if the green belt excluded it. As a result, the health authority chose not to take the sensible advice of the inspector and get on with making Orpington the major hospital in the district. It chose instead to persuade Bromley council to agree to an alteration in the boundary of the green belt so as to exclude the site. This rather disreputable manoeuvre is now under way. I hope that local conservationists will be up in arms about it.

The poor quality of management that was revealed by the error has been the cause of many of the health authority's decisions that have affected Orpington hospital. There is undoubtedly a reluctance on the part of the authority, which draws most of its members from the north of the borough, to give Orpington hospital a fair deal in respect of staff and other resources. I cannot count the number of times that I have frustrated efforts to change the official development plan to the detriment of Orpington by initiating Adjournment debates.

In the financial year just ended, Bromley health authority was well over its budget. Drastic cuts, masquerading as rationalisation plans, were made to save money. Where did the cuts largely fall? You have guessed it, Mr. Deputy Speaker—they fell largely on Orpington hospital. They leave it without any general surgery, intensive care units or a casualty service of any sort. There is not even a minor injuries unit. There are fewer wards and fewer beds. The Canada wing is in danger of becoming a white elephant. In these circumstances, a ghastly tragedy could occur at any time for want of on-site surgery, anaesthetists and inter-hospital transport. It should be remembered that the nearby M25 is the scene of many major accidents involving casualties on a large scale. We need surgery services at Orpington hospital.

It is ironic that the money that is sought to be saved by the cuts—£1·5 million in a budget of £82 million per annum—amounts to the same sum as that which is thrown away on surveyors and other expenses for the abortive super-hospital. As if to prove that it is indifferent to the waste of public funds, the regional health authority, South East Thames, whose general manager was general manager at Bromley when the bureaucratic scheme was launched, has recently given another £1·5 million to pay for continuing design fees and other expenses.

I have heard from one designer who is involved that the entire project is being scaled down because of escalating costs and falling land values. A 500-bed hospital is now being contemplated. Even if the hospital is built, the new Bromley hospital cannot be ready before the year 2000. What is to happen meanwhile? Orpington hospital has been truncated. The existing Bromley hospital is bursting at the seams. Queen Mary's hospital, which is just over the border in the area covered by Bexley health district, cannot cope.

Was there ever such a muddle? It is no wonder that, in January, the community health council passed unanimously a vote of no confidence in the health authority. It was alarmed at the authority's failure to consult and at the waste of management time and resources being spent on the new hospital before planning consent had been obtained. It said that the £1·5 million could have been better spent on existing services. The professional medical staff are extremely worried by what might happen in the present hiatus. They approved of the new hospital on the understanding that it would be under way before any rationalisation of existing services took place. We could be heading for the worst possible outcome—no new Bromley hospital because of insufficient funds and land, and no expansion of Orpington hospital, because the land available has been sold to private developers.

The people responsible for this muddle should have been sacked rather than promoted, and members of the health authority who condoned the inefficiency and faulty judgment involved and failed to correct it should be censured. It is a pity that nowadays the members of a health authority are not drawn from the ranks of the elected councils in the districts concerned, where they could at least be called to account.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Health told me a day or two ago that she has appointed a new chairman for the Bromley health authority, a Mr. Alan Cumming. She seems to have plucked him out of the air. I was not informed or consulted about his appointment. However good he is, he will not have the authority, let alone the experience, to do what is required to stop this nonsense. The Minister herself should intervene and tell the authority that it should stick to the existing plan and in any event get on with building up Orpington as a district general hospital without further delay.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) has, for many years, been a doughty fighter for Orpington hospital. In preparing for the debate, I looked over the speeches that he made. Both my immediate predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), and his predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), were called to account by my hon. Friend for the way in which the health service has been planning the hospital facilities for his constituents in Orpington, and quite properly so. On both those occasions, and again this evening, he expressed vigorously and clearly the views that I am sure are widely held in his constituency, and did so in a way that leaves us with no option—nor should we have an option—but to take them seriously.

Before I deal with the substance of what my hon. Friend has had to say about the circumstances in which the NHS finds itself in Orpington I shall set it in the context of the way in which the NHS has to be managed. You will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the NHS is a vast organisation that cannot be run on the basis that every significant decision within it is made by one of four Ministers sat in Richmond house. It is, I believe, the largest organisation in the world in terms of the number of people that is employs, with two exceptions—the Red Army and the Indian railway, both of which made the mistake of over-centralising to an extent that we are determined to avoid in the management of the NHS.

For that reason, we have set up and recently reinforced a management system within the health service that delegates responsibility to district health authorities and, within health authorities, to the management teams within the hospitals, in order to ensure that the people who are responsible for using taxpayers' money to provide a health care system in each locality feel that they are responsible for the way in which the cash is used in the particular unit in which they work. That commitment to delegation, and then to accountability, which is the other side of the same coin, is something that we in the Department hold as a key objective in the evolution of our health service policy.

My hon. Friend, in talking about the impact of that on Bromley district health authority, regretted the fact that the passing of councillors from the health authority meant that, as he saw it, there was no local accountability to the local authority. I do not apologise for that, because, although we have a commitment to delegate, the NHS is ultimately accountable to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and, through him, to the House. That is why my hon. Friend is entirely right, despite that commitment to delegation within the management system of the health service, to call Ministers to account in the House for the way in which taxpayers' money is used within the health service and the solutions that are arrived at by that delegated system of management.

There is a nice balance to be struck within the management of the health service. Ministers stress the importance of delegating decisions so as to ensure that resources are used effectively in each locality. Despite the fact that we emphasise the importance of that delegation, we do not duck our accountability for the decisions that the bureaucracy ultimately reaches. It is right and proper that the issues that are of obvious and continuing concern to my hon. Friend's constituents should detain the House this evening and that he should bring them to our attention.

The way in which my hon. Friend presented his constituents' concerns highlights the fact that there are two issues affecting the provision of health care in his constituency. Those issues can perhaps be run together, but they are nevertheless separate. The first issue is whether it is right to centralise acute care on a single site, in this case, the Elmfield site to which my hon. Friend devoted a considerable part of his speech.

My hon. Friend suggested that there was an official plan that called for the continued provision of acute care on two sites within the health district. I think that he will accept—although he may disagree with it—that for some time, it has been the established preference of the health service management in Bromley and within South East Thames to centralise acute care in Bromley on a single site. To describe the policy of providing acute care on two sites as the official policy of the health service management is no longer accurate.

The reasons why health service managers in Bromley have sought, or wish, to centralise acute care on a single hospital site in my hon. Friend's constituency, or serving his constituency, are not dissimilar from those in other parts of the country. They are familiar arguments. Advances in modern medicine provide us with a great opportunity, which we must seize and use properly, to provide an improving quality of acute care while, at the same time, employing fewer acute beds. There is a long-term decline—not merely in this country, but throughout the developed world—in the demand for acute beds and acute hospital space in the provision of an advanced health service. That argument, coupled with the increased dependence of acute care on high technology, has resulted in a pressure to centralise acute care into high-tech centres of excellence, not only in my hon. Friend's constituency but elsewhere.

That is one side of the argument, but my hon. Friend was right to stress the other side, which is to ensure that as acute care is centralised into centres of excellence, it is not allowed to become too divorced from the communities that it is supposed to serve. He was also right to stress the importance of considerations of local access, clinical viability and the development of centres of excellence.

That nexus of substantive issues is important and cannot be ducked, for it should concern anyone who is interested in the development of an efficient, modern system of health care.

The second set of issues that my hon. Friend mentioned involve planning issues related to the green belt. Quite reasonably, he quoted from the report of the inspector, who appeared to support the proposition that if acute care is to be centralised in Bromley, it should be centralised on the site of the Orpington hospital in my hon. Friend's constituency. As a distinguished lawyer, my hon. Friend will know the danger of relying on judges' obiter dicta. The question that the inspector was asked was not, "Where should the hospital be?" but, "Should the hospital be built at Elmfield?" Although my hon. Friend is entitled to pray in aid the inspector, I think that my hon. Friend will agree that the passage that he quoted from the inspector's report was of the nature of an obiter dicta. I am not sure what the singular of obiter dicta is. It was an obiter dictum, presumably.

It is not a factor on which we should put too much weight. Our planning system does not allow inspectors to tell us where we should build things; it asks inspectors whether a particular proposal—in this case a proposal to build the hospital at Elmfield—should be allowed. It must be right that the local authority, as the planning authority, and the health authority that wishes to build the hospital should retain the power of initiative in deciding planning questions. The inspector can dispose, but he should not be able to propose.

As my hon. Friend said, the London borough of Bromley, will vote on a proposal to change the nature of the green belt in the borough on 1 May, so it would be wrong for me to pre-empt what the council may say about a proposed change in the arrangements. It would also be wrong to pre-empt anything that may happen as a result of the change in the limits of the green belt.

However, it is fair to say that a decision on a major investment, such as has been envisaged by the health authority at Elmfield, would ultimately come to Ministers. Although this evening we can have a discussion that may illuminate some of the issues, I would not wish—it would be quite wrong to do so—to pre-empt the decision that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would make if a revised Elmfield proposal, which it was realistic to expect could be built because the planning law had been changed, came to him. There are a number of conditions in that sentence, all of which would have to be satisfied before a Minister could be asked to approve that proposal.

My hon. Friend has raised a substantive set of issues around the question of whether there should be a single-site acute care provision in Bromley. There are many hurdles still to be gone over before Ministers could be asked to make a specific decision. My hon. Friend's debate has served to remind us of his continuing interest in the outcome of that decision and of the strength of his feelings and those of his constituents about the outcome of that decision, when it is made.

The second issue is the temporary closures announced by the health authority in January this year. It has always been part of the management model of the health service that we consult before we make substantial changes, but that the health authorities reserve the right to make changes without consultation when financial pressures require urgent action. That was precisely the position in which the health authority found itself in January.

However, if a health authority makes such a temporary, short-term decision under financial pressure, it remains under an obligation to consult before the decisions are made final. That is why the health authority has issued the consultation document on the proposals and why the consultation is currently going ahead on the proposals that were implemented by the health authority in January.

My hon. Friend will recognise that the health authority believes that, as a result of the changes, it is still offering the same basic level of service measured by activity or output measures, but on a different pattern around the district which, I can understand, is less popular with my hon. Friend's constituents than the pattern that previously prevailed. In considering whether the changes should be made permanent, it is legitimate to consider not only the fact that there is a £1 million revenue saving for the health authority as a result, but the question of access for my hon. Friend's constituents to the health care that is provided.

As my hon. Friend will know, if the community health council chooses to sustain its opposition, which it has expressed clearly in its letter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 24 January, and to put forward an alternative proposal for the management of health care in Bromley which can still deliver the underlying objective for each health service manager, which is to live within the budget, the temporary closures could come to Ministers for them to make a decision. Once again, it would be wrong for me this evening to pre-empt any decision that my right hon. Friend may make as the result of such an appeal by the community health council.

My hon. Friend has taken the opportunity this evening to draw the attention of the House to difficult issues in his constituency. Both the long-term question of the centralisation of care and the short-term question of the changes implemented in January could ultimately come to my right hon. Friend for decision. I assure my hon. Friend that his arguments to the House this evening would be taken seriously into account in any decision that my right hon. Friend made in those circumstances.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

St. Francis Primary School, Notting Hill

9.36 am

Mr. Dudley Fishburn (Kensington): I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of the governors, teachers, parents and neighbours of St. Francis primary school, Treadgold street, Notting Hill, in my constituency of Kensington. The petition states that the redevelopment of the school is a matter of great urgency because of the highly unsatisfactory conditions in which 325 children are being taught. The proposed redevelopment depends on the closure of Treadgold street, in the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea. The petition has been signed by more than 2,000 people, which constitutes some 5 per cent. of my electorate in the constituency of Kensington.

The petitioners pray that your honourable House requests the Right Hon. Secretary of State, Department of Transport to grant immediate permission for the closure of Treadgold street so that work on the redevelopment, the plans for which already have been approved by the Department of Education and Science and the Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea, may begin without further delay.

To lie upon the Table.

Orders of the Day

Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered. Order for Third Reading read.

9.38 am

Mr. Dudley Fishburn (Kensington): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Although this is a private Member's Bill, I hope that the House will not think it boastful if I say that it is an important Bill. It will enable new rules to be set that will govern the way in which nearly 500,000 shipments of radioactive and nuclear material go by road in this country every year.

It is a radical Bill in its way, for it gives the Department of Transport powers of entry and inspection and allows penalties to be exacted on those who break the rules when carrying highly dangerous radioactive material on our roads. The regulations that will be enabled by the Bill will set the safety standards for the nuclear and radioactive industries at the highest international levels. They will determine the parameters for nuclear tranport in the generation ahead—a generation which is likely to see the rapid growth in that industry, which is so important to modern life, whether providing nuclear fuel for power plants or cancer-searching radioisotopes to the hospitals. Within the power of the atom lies the certain source of our future energy needs. As we unlock it, we will gain in knowledge—an ally and not an enemy—but only if we are rigorous in controlling that power and in restraining the methods by which it is used, and in the case of the Bill, ensuring that when radioactive material is moved from one place to another it is secure.

Although it is an important Bill, it has not been a controversial one. I am afraid that in this House we often muddle the two. We think that anything that does not kick up a political dust storm cannot be of real worth.

The Bill slipped through to Third Reading with uncommon agility. The Second Reading was over and done with in six minutes flat. The Committee stage, I am afraid, took longer, but in eight minutes from start to finish no critics appeared and thus I bring the Bill to the Floor of the House unamended. In the incomprehensible way, to me at least, that these things work, this Bill, which was ninth in the list of private Member's Bills when it started, is now second and, with a fair wind, it looks like being the first private Member's Bill to reach the statute book this season. There has been good reason for that turn of speed because, by passing the Bill into law, Parliament is bringing Britain into line with its international commitments that were given as long ago as 1985. The deadline for meeting those commitments disgracefully ran out last year without any action having been taken by the United Kingdom, although all our major trading partners have by now taken the necessary steps to comply.

Britain is a leading member of the International Atomic Energy Agency, an arm of the United Nations in Vienna, which lays down standards for the world's radioactive and nuclear industries. That authority has long been concerned with the quality of the regulations that govern the movement of radioactive materials by road. After all, that is perhaps the moment of their greatest vulnerability. A fuel rod that will soon be surrounded by tonnes of concrete in a power station is on nothing more substantial than a truck when it is being delivered. A radioisotope, which is safe in the hands of a surgeon, has to be handled by a driver or a porter in a hospital.

The International Atomic Energy Agency is concerned, first, because of the sheer number of shipments—about half a million in Britain every year. Some of those shipments are in large trucks trundling to nuclear power stations from the railhead. Sometimes small parts of radioactive material are almost chucked into the back of an engineer's van on the way to measuring the stress in, say, a North sea oil rig.

The powers that the Department of Transport has to oversee such shipments need to be brought up to date because they date back to the last time that the House considered these matters, which was in 1947—a time when the nuclear industry was in its infancy and when there were probably no more than 100 shipments a year by road.

That is one cause for concern, but there is a second. Whenever a shipment of radioactive material goes by boat across the channel, for example, or by air, as do tens of thousands of packets every year, due to the thriving market that Britain has built up in medical exports, the regulations are modern and effective because as soon as they travel outside this country they are governed by regulations set by international agencies. However, if one puts a dollop of radioactive material in the back of a road vehicle, by a curious loophole of our legislative history, the method of enforcing standards of safety and packaging for that material dates back to 1947. Hence the reason for the Bill.

The International Atomic Energy Agency has requested that all its members have a central, competent authority for road transport to make and to enforce the rules. In Britain's case the Bill makes the Department of Transport that authority, which is why I welcome the Minister's presence this morning.

The Bill does not set down the rules. It is an enabling Bill because it is not a matter for laymen like ourselves to write such rules. Besides, the needs and requirements will change constantly. The Bill enables the Secretary of State for Transport to set regulations, which will cover such aspects as the design and nature of containers for radioactive materials, their resistance to burning or crushing, how many small packets, when put together, can be transported safely—as the total radiation grows exponentially—and how such packets should be labelled.

Regulations in such a highly expert and scientific area will be set after close discussion with the industry, and that is entirely right. It is worth pointing out at this stage that the nuclear and radioactive industries have been wholly behind the Bill. For the most part they already more than meet the highest standards and they understand the need to modernise the legislative framework within which they operate. That is something that the nuclear industry welcomes, not something which it fears. Why? Because without the Bill the Department of Transport is only able to make general regulations which fail to reflect the world standards in packaging, labelling and transport documentation. However, such standards are needed if we are to convince other countries that the United Kingdom applies the United Nations transport regulations of 1985 to its radioactive industry.

Although this legislation would apply only to domestic road transport, it would also cover radioactive material intended for international transit. Therefore, by adopting the International Atomic Energy Agency's standards we shall bring ourselves into line with other countries which compete with the United Kingdom in world markets. Some of those countries have a reputation for using non-tariff barriers to protect their own markets. They say that they will not let in British supplies of medical radio isotopes or nuclear material because they are not packaged up to international scratch. That is an excuse which they can cling to until we pass the regulations for which provision is made in the Bill. We must be able to demonstrate that packages used to transport radioactive material nationally and internationally comply fully with standards laid down by the International Atomic Energy Agency. At the moment we cannot.

In view of 1992, what is the position of other EC member countries? After all, they are now our major trading partners, and all the EC countries are members of the IAEA. As such, they are under the same obligations as the United Kingdom, and almost all of them have already adopted the international regulations that I am seeking to introduce by means of the Bill.

The European agreement for transporting dangerous goods by road, to which all EC states are a party, came into effect on 1 January 1990, more than a year ago. In line with other international regulations, it uses the standards laid down in this enabling Bill as guidelines. The provisions of the Bill are aimed at ensuring that the regulations made under it fully reflect the International Atomic Energy Agency's philosophy of building safety into the packages used to transport radioactive materials. It is a philosophy which the agency and its member states have operated effectively for the past 30 years. In stark constrast to much of the criticism of the nuclear industry, we have had an extraordinarily strong record both in this country and in the western world of developing the industry along safe and reasonable lines.

Clause 1 will empower the Secretary of State to appoint inspectors to implement the Bill and to enforce any regulations made under it. Clause 2 will give the Secretary of State power to make a comprehensive set of regulations to cover all aspects of the transport by road of radioactive materials. In clause 3, further provisions set out the circumstances in which an inspector appointed under the Road Traffic Act 1988 could stop a vehicle transporting radioactive packages. An inspector could prohibit the transport of such packages or the use of a particular component in the packaging of nuclear material. Those powers are not available at present to the Department of Transport. However, other agencies that work in the field of nuclear material, such as Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in the Department of the Environment, already have such powers. The Bill therefore gives the Department of Transport powers that it would otherwise not have. It closes a loophole.

If an inspector believes that someone is failing to comply with the regulations, he will be able, under clause 4, to issue an enforcement notice. Such a notice will specify the failure and the steps that must be taken to remedy it. Again, that is something which other agencies have available to them. What is novel is that under the Bill the regulations apply for the first time to this very important industry.

Clause 5 gives powers of entry and sets out the circumstances in which inspectors and examiners can enter vehicles and premises with or without consent. It also specifies when an inspector may seize evidence.

Finally, clause 6 makes it an offence to contravene or to fail to comply with the regulations made under the Bill. The same clause also contains penalties for the committing of such offences. It will allow prosecution to be either by summons or by indictment, depending on the severity of the offence. Again, the general thrust is that the clause serves only to bring the Secretary of State's powers on the transport of nuclear material by road into line with those that are available in other areas of the nuclear industry.

With those provisions, the Secretary of State will be able to ensure that when he makes regulations they can be effectively enforced. Then we shall be sure that the increase in the transport of nuclear material for industry, medical use and engineering can be effectively controlled.

It is a good Bill. It addresses an immediate and real need. It closes a loophole. It will set guidelines for a generation. Those guidelines will be the world's best practice. The Bill is so sensible and overdue that the Opposition have mounted no criticims of it, for which I am grateful. It is supported by the industry, by users and by the Government. It sets a new legislative benchmark for the movement of what are potentially the most hazardous materials known to man. It dusts off legislation that was last touched in 1947. It is necessary if we are to meet our international obligations. Therefore, I commend the Bill to the House.

9.51 am

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I congratulate the hon. Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) on bringing the Bill before the House. As it stands, the Bill is not controversial and, to the extent that it goes, we very much welcome it. However, there are wider considerations that it is appropriate to bring before the House on Third Reading.

Today is the fifth anniversay of the Chernobyl disaster. Nearly all of us can remember exactly where we were five years ago today when we had that terrible rainstorm and realised that a good part of the contamination was spreading from Chernobyl all round the world and finding its way to parts of our country. It is right and proper, therefore, that today of all days, five years on, we should be dealing with a measure that concerns the transportation of radioactive substances. If ever the House needed a reminder of how important an issue this is, it need look no further than at what happened at Chernobyl.

It is also important to point out that five years after Chernobyl there are still problems and that there will continue to be problems for thousands of years. They will affect the people who live in that part of the Soviet Union. There will continue to be problems over the safety requirements for the reactors that continue to function there. Moreover, there will continue to be problems over the transportation of radioactive material. Therefore, it is incumbent on us to do everything that can be done to impose the highest possible standards for the occasions when there is no alternative but for radioactive substances to be transported by one mode or another.

Although I do not take issue with the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill, I take issue with the Government. The Opposition believe that an integrated transport system is needed that will enable goods, whether or not they are dangerous, to be transported safely by different modes of transport. We believe that the highest possible safety standards should apply to all those modes and that such standards should apply to radioactive goods, just as they apply to the transport of all forms of dangerous goods.

The Opposition are greatly concerned about the fact that although in this Session the Government have introduced five transport Bills and found sufficient parliamentary time to deal with issues that they consider to be the highest on their list of priorities, they have not found time to address this issue. They have introduced a measure to privatise the trust ports, which are likely to be sold off. Today we learnt that the hospital trust at Guy's is to shed 600 jobs. However, the Government have not found time to bring before the House a Bill that would deal comprehensively with the transportation of all dangerous goods by all modes of transport—ship, rail, road and air. We criticise the Government for their piecemeal approach. A major cornerstone of our policy is the integration of the transport of all dangerous goods and the making of detailed regulations to cover their transportation, including packaging, monitoring, enforcement and all the other issues that need to be covered if we are to ensure that when dangerous goods are transported the highest possible standards apply.

Only yesterday I discussed with freight forwarders in the south-west region, including south Wales, their concern that regulations governing the movement of goods by road to Europe are incompatible with those that apply to the movement of goods by sea. Their great concern is that the convention governing the carriage of goods by road, imposed by most other European countries as a mandatory requirement, has a get-out clause in this country. There are big loopholes concerning the carriage of all sorts of dangerous goods. The Bill should be viewed within the framework which could exist, but which, because of lack of political priority, does not exist.

The regulations governing the transport of radioactive material in the United Kingdom implement International Atomic Energy Agency regulations, which are kept under continual review. Major revisions take place every 10 years and the most recent was in 1990. The point has already been made that it is disgraceful that the latest regulations were not implemented at the earliest opportunity and that the introduction of tighter regulations has been left to a private Member's Bill. I condemn the Government for that.

Within the United Kingdom, different regulations apply to transport by the four modes of road, air, sea and rail. The Bill is designed, as we have heard, to update the legislation on the transportation of radioactive material by road and to bring it into line with the IAEA regulations. We welcome the fact that the Bill gives the Secretary of State powers to make regulations and that inspectors or examiners are provided with the authority to impose prohibitions on the driving of a vehicle or on the transportation of a radioactive package. They will be able to serve enforcement notices if there is a failure to comply with the prohibitions. It is also important that powers of entry should be provided for inspectors or examiners and the Bill should be enforced by means of a series of penalties if offences are committed.

We have one concern about the Bill which we could not raise during its earlier stages and which we might not have raised anyway, because we want the Bill to reach the statute book. Had a comprehensive Bill been introduced, we should have wanted the regulations to provide for prior notification of the movement of any radioactive substances. Local authorities, the emergency services and the nuclear-free zone movement feel very strongly about that. We believe that there are compelling reasons why the emergency services and local authorities should be made aware in advance of the passage through their areas of all radioactive, toxic and hazardous substances. It is impossible to draw up effective emergency plans if the emergency services are given no information until an accident occurs. I urge the Minister to give that some consideration when drawing up the regulations.

More information about freight lorries carrying dangerous materials could prevent accidents, injury and loss of life. Two years ago there was an accident near Peterborough where a lorry carrying explosives caught fire. The fire brigade was called and, tragically, one firefighter died when the explosives detonated. The fire brigade had not been notified of the contents of the lorry and therefore had been unable to make contingency plans. I hope that the Minister will have regard to that important matter.

Luckily, the contents of the lorry were not radioactive. It would have been much more devastating had the fire brigade been called to deal with an accident involving the release of radioactivity without being given prior warning.

It has always been claimed that low-level radioactive substances make up the vast majority of freight transported by road and are not considered to be a great threat to safety and the environment. However, spent fuel rods for research make regular journeys by road from Harwell to Dounreay for reprocessing. A considerable quantity of such goods is transported by road.

Up to 50 research reactors in 22 countries use the same type of fuel and may wish to do business with plants in Britain. Foreign business could eventually build up to £25 million a year. The transport methods and routes which could be used in that context are uncertain, but it is likely that more spent fuels would arrive by sea at Scrabster. However, large shipments from Berlin, Holland, Saxony and perhaps from Australia would have to come into larger ports and thereafter be transported by road.

There would be a greater threat to the environment from the risk of an accident involving spent HEU fuel in transit. The International Atomic Energy Agency requires flasks for transporting spent fuel to be designed to survive the impact of a 9 m fall, which is equivalent to an impact speed of about 30 mph; being engulfed by fire for 30 minutes at a temperature of 800 deg. C; and immersion at a depth of 200 m for one hour. The independent consulting engineers Large and Associates consider those tests not particularly onerous.

Last year there were several attempts to ship from Germany to Hull radioactive material which was to be sent to Dounreay by road. Only the refusal of dock workers in Rotterdam and Hull to handle the cargo prevented shipment in an unsafe vessel. The shipment was first attempted by a container ship. Then it was proposed that it should be carried by roll-on, roll-off ferry. Such an approach in shipping can be easily translated to all modes of transport, with industry taking the attitude that the flasks are so indestructible that it is unimportant how they are transported. However, nuclear explosions in the relatively controlled environment of Chernobyl and Three Mile Island caused disasters on a devastating scale. The risk of transporting weapon-grade radioactive substances are obvious causes for concern and are one reason why in the United States there is a moratorium on imports until proper environmental assessments have been made.

Had there been a comprehensive Bill on the subject, we should have tabled an amendment to ensure that regulations apply equally to transshipments dealt with by the Ministry of Defence and by the Department of Transport. The road transportation of nuclear weapons which are not subject even to the most elementary regulations because the Ministry of Defence is exempt from them is another cause for concern.

I do not know whether the Minister is aware of a report by the panel on the safety of nuclear weapons. On 18 December the United States House Armed Services Committee was informed by eminent physicists that flaws in past computer modelling can be indentified and that a major consequence of new modelling is the realisation that unintended nuclear detonation presents a greater risk than was previously estimated.

I should refer to representations that have been made concerning the road transport of nuclear weapons. That issue is not covered by the Bill, but would have been in a comprehensive Bill. It is particularly important in the light of the American report on nuclear weapon safety which was highlighted in The Guardian earlier this week.

Many local authorities, including that in Stoke-on-Trent, have made representations to the Department of Transport. They have considered the report of Large and Associates entitled: "Transportation of nuclear weapons through urban areas in the United Kingdom." That report was commissioned by the steering committee of nuclear-free zone local authorities, which are greatly concerned about possible disasters, including a major release of radioactivity from a nuclear warhead which could affect areas up to 40 km away and the consequences for the immediate population. If the Department of Transport has any concern about an integrated transport policy, it should consult the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Defence to come up with some emergency arrangements which, instead of leaving us ill prepared to deal with accidents, would enable us to take the necessary precautions.

It is also possible that road accidents could involve unintentional detonation of weapons. The worst possible scenario would be a nuclear explosion, not just a limited leak or a radioactive cloud. The fact that at least two journeys involving radioactive freight are made every week gives rise to considerable concern. I relate those findings in the context of today's debate to emphasise the need for a totally integrated approach to the transportation of radioactive and hazardous substances.

The Labour party supports freedom of information and open discussion about public safety issues. We believe that we can learn from the American experience of ensuring that information is publicly available instead of hidden behind a cloak of secrecy. Public safety can only benefit from increased openness and local authorities with responsibility for dealing with disasters should have the necessary information to enable them to deal with accidents involving the transportation of nuclear waste.

We believe that environmental considerations should be paramount in any transport policy involving safety. Efforts should be made to minimise the amount of radioactive substances transported, instead of planning to move such substances from A to B along the safest route and allowing profits to be made.

The introduction of inspectors is certainly a step in the right direction towards greater regulation and safety. However, those inspectors must not be policy administrators from the Department of Transport, but must have experience of dealing with road accidents and be experts in safety and dangerous materials. The Bill refers to the financial considerations. I have grave fears that not enough inspectors may be appointed. How many people does the Minister expect to be appointed to deal with those new regulations? If they are to be associated with the radioactive waste movement unit and inspectorate at the Department of Transport, it is essential that there are enough inspectors to enforce the regulations.

I draw the Minister's attention to the question of spot checks. Back in June 1989, the Atomic Energy Authority was found guilty of allowing one of its vehicles to be used in an unroadworthy condition and was fined £1,600. It is really not on for such materials to be transported in vehicles that are not safe to be on the road. There are huge question marks over public safety.

Let me give an even more recent example. In late February this year a load of spent fuel from India—part of a 30-year-old contract—was travelling by road from Felixstowe to Dounreay. At Dounreay, it was found to be contaminated and the contamination was traced back to Felixstowe, where a crane was dismantled and taken to Harlow for checks. Even though there is much secrecy surrounding the transportation of radioactive material, we know that there was contamination at Felixstowe. But as there was no legal obligation on the carrier to monitor en route, it was not discovered until the load reached Dounreay. The contamination involved will be a persistent problem for a 200-year period at least, given that caesium has a half life of 30 years. That is why we believe that the new regulations should include proper provision for spot checks so that a load can be monitored anywhere along its route.

With the large-scale transportation of weapons and standard radioactive substances on our roads, people will rightly be concerned that the regulations are rigorously enforced. Where necessary, regulations should be strengthened to ensure maximum environmental and public safety. The Bill takes us one step nearer to that objective. It would have been much better had the provisions been incorporated in a comprehensive Bill dealing with all aspects of the transportation of dangerous goods and the various modes of transport used. Having said that, I do not wish to delay proceedings on the Bill, which is long overdue. I hope that the Minister will respond to the points that I have made and that the Bill will soon reach the statute book.

10.12 am

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I join hon. Members in welcoming this important Bill and commend my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) on the thoroughly professional way in which he has carried it through the House. I hope that it will meet with equal success—and lack of delay—in the other place, and that it will reach the statute books very soon. I apologise to my hon. Friend for not having been able to speak in support of the Bill on Second Reading, but he had only six minutes, and he seemed to be doing perfectly well without my intervention.

My hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt defend himself, but I feel that I cannot let the speech of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) go without comment. The hon. Lady demanded an integrated transport policy. Heaven preserve us from such a monstrosity. Fortunately, no Labour Government have ever managed to achieve such a thing. The Department of Transport is quite big enough. The idea of a huge department in Whitehall deciding where all the transshipments of every commodity are to go and how they will all match—and, of course, consulting the unions at every stage—fills me with horror.

Ms. Walley: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Currie: No. The hon. Lady has had half an hour; it is my go now.

That is not the way to run a modern, complex, industrial and commercial society. It just does not work, and it is about time that the Labour party realised that and did with that policy what it has done with most of its others, which is to drop them in favour of more intelligent philosophies.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North referred to the delay. I understand that the Bill was introduced in the last Session, but was delayed because of technical problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington therefore deserves even more credit for introducing it in this Session.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North said that the emergency services should be advised every time there is to be a transshipment of dangerous material, particularly radioactive material. As I shall explain further in a moment, I have considerable interest in the transportation of radioactive material. A fair number of the 500,000 transports every year go through my constituency involve work conducted by my constituents. The thought that the emergency services must be notified on every single occasion fills me with horror. Must we really devise a system of telling the emergency services, setting up road blocks and God knows what? It is a preposterous proposal.

Is the hon. Lady saying that Derbyshire county council should be advised every time Derbyshire royal infirmary requires a new isotope for its cancer treatment machine? How long would it take for the bureaucracy to deal with the request? What is my constituent with cancer to do in the meantime? Is he or she to wait until some stupid little bureaucrat in Matlock has decided whether the competent professional company that has produced the isotope is capable of transporting it safely through south Derbyshire and installing it safely at the hospital? The whole idea is absolutely ridiculous.

Ms. Walley: Does not the hon. Lady think that there is any merit at all in the proposal? Does not she realise that we are dealing with radioactive substances, nuclear weapons and highly inflammable material, and unless the emergency services know what material is being transported they might deal with it in a wholly inappropriate way? Public safety is at stake and should be given the highest priority. It is possible to deal with the matter in a reasonable way.

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Lady is shifting her ground. That is not what the nuclear-free zone exercise involved. She now says that most nuclear material and most dangerous material does not fall into the relevant category. That is not what she said earlier, and she has not answered my question.

Ms. Walley: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Currie: No, I will not give way to the hon. Lady again. It is about time that I had my say. The hon. Lady can sit and listen for a minute.

Let me pursue the matter further. Like the hon. Lady's local council, Derbyshire county council is a member of the nuclear-free zones international committee, or whatever it is called. Some years ago, when it got involved in this silly activity, Derbyshire announced that no nuclear or radioactive material would be in use anywhere on its patch. That gave rise to guffaws of derision because it was plain—and the hon. Lady has shown this again today—that those who proposed such policies did not have the faintest idea how a modern society functions in the 1980s and 1990s.

We have large amounts of nuclear material in Derbyshire, as is the case everywhere in the country. The quantities may not be huge, but nuclear materials are used in a large number of places. For a start, we have some of the finest hospitals in the country, which are outstanding in their treatment of cancer. We are immensely proud of them. I want them to function properly in the interests of the patients concerned. We have extremely strict rules to protect the staff who use the equipment. As a former Minister of Health, I am only too aware of how important such equipment can be, how strict the rules are and how good the training is. Thousands of people owe their lives to the availability of nuclear material for treatment.

In my part of the world—not far from the hon. Lady's constituency—we have industry of the highest standard. Nuclear material is used to establish the quality and high standards that we need in modern engineering. We have some of the highest-tech industry in the world. We are world beaters. We have no fears about 1992 or a Japanese invasion. We can take on anyone and beat them. One reason for that is that we are not frightened of new technologies. We create, design, implement, install and monitor those technologies and we are certain that we know how to use them. The materials have to be transported.

Most important of all, Derby is the heart of the nuclear industry in Britain in ways that are perhaps not generally appreciated. It is in the nature of the way in which the industry has developed in Derby that on the whole the industrialists have kept fairly quiet about it. The time is approaching, however, when we must recognise the quality of the work that is being done and its importance to the nation and the rest of the world. I am afraid that that will mean more transportation of materials in future, and that is why the Bill is so important.

We manufacture nuclear power stations in Derby. A large number of businesses are involved in the manufacture, design and contracting of nuclear power stations which go all over the world. We also have a company of which we are immensely proud—Rolls-Royce and Associates. It was set up some 40 years ago when the Americans agreed under various defence contracts to transfer technology on the nuclear power pack for submarines from the United States to Britain. RR and A was then set up and it has been functioning since with not a whisper of criticism. Indeed, I suspect that many people do not even know that the firm is there, right in the heart of Derby. It employs over 1,000 people. It has probably the largest concentration of PhDs outside any university. We have nuclear physicists of the highest calibre in commercial industry. We are immensely proud of the work that they do.

I visited Rolls-Royce and Associates not long ago. To say that I was immensely impressed is an understatement. My query to it was why the company did not talk more about the work that it did, for now it makes the nuclear power packs for not only submarines which carry nuclear weapons but many other submarines. It is now standard practice to equip most submarines with power packs that do not need renewing in the conventional way. They are nuclear power packs. They run silently and for many months without any need for maintenance. They are extremely safe. There is no problem in recruiting people to work on those submarines.

It always struck me as ironic that much of Derby was represented for many years by that noted pacifist Philip Noel-Baker when meanwhile in the middle of the city we were manufacturing the most essential part of nuclear submarines. Perhaps it is not so ironic if one considers that the very existence of the nuclear deterrent and nuclear submarines have kept the peace for so long.

I asked Rolls-Royce and Associates for its views on the Bill. I received a letter this week from Mr. Tony Jaggers, the company quality manager. He said:

"we believe that the Bill is a responsible attempt at regulation. Compliance should only enhance the image of the nuclear industry."

He was right about that. We need to take the industry a substantial step further. We need to lose our fear of the nuclear industry. We need to put on one side our feeling that radioactivity is a magic miasma against which we should have incantations and regulations and that we should cloak the industry in the bureaucratic blanket that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North suggested.

That is why this legislation is so timely. We are updating legislation which goes back to 1948. If the Labour party had been so worried about the transport of radioactive materials, it had plenty of opportunities in the 1960s and 1970s to update the regulations. It never took them. It is a credit to this Government that we have.

It is about time that we started revising our ideas, especially about nuclear power. Let me describe my experiences. My constituency is in the Trent valley. We have been mining coal for a long time. Within sight of my home in south Derbyshire there are four coal-fired power stations. There are several more just over the hill. It is well known in my constituency that I bought a cottage in France, in the Loire valley. I like valleys. Not far from the cottage is the nuclear power station of St. Antoine. There are four nuclear power stations in the Loire valley. Therefore, as a housekeeper and a domestic person, I can make comparisons between life in the Trent and Loire valleys.

The first and most obvious difference is that the air in the Loire valley is a lot cleaner than that in the Trent valley. I can go back to my house there and find that it is not dusty. The air is breathable. The plants in the garden do not have a rime of dust on them. Yet in south Derbyshire I and my constituents are for ever trying to keep our homes clean. There is a permanent film of dust in every house, in every garden and on every car. I can leave my car for a week in France and at the end of the week it will still be clean. If I leave it for three days in the car park at Derby station, it needs to go to the car wash.

We have taken for granted and willingly accepted for too long the risks associated with non-nuclear power and all the dangers that go with it. Does anyone in Britain count the cost of our being so dependent on non-nuclear power? Does anyone work out the effect on the chests and hearts of my constituents and other people who live in areas where power stations endlessly pollute the atmosphere, even with all the effort——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I am finding it difficult to relate what the hon. Lady is saying to the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mrs. Currie: I am making a point which relates to what the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North said and the importance of the Bill to the future development of our country. We have for so long taken it for granted that we cannot use nuclear power in this country or that it should be kept to a small proportion. Countries which do not take such a view, and therefore transport more nuclear material, do not have that problem.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Has my hon. Friend read the latest edition of Euratom in which it is announced that the Swedish Government, which had a policy of phasing out all nuclear power stations, have reversed that policy on a multi-party basis? Irrespective of the party in power, the Swedish Government will move towards nuclear power precisely because of the arguments that my hon. Friend makes.

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I am sure that he is right. It is noticeable that the Swedish Government are changing their policies on many issues and perhaps moving into the modern capitalist world in several welcome ways. My hon. Friend is absolutely right.

The Bill is much more important than the relatively short debates on it have shown. It will enable us to transport nuclear material more safely. If we need to revise all our ideas about the type of power that we shall use in future, we need to be sure that we can transport the materials safely. Of course, we can. But whenever people talk about nuclear power, they talk about the risks and the cost. The aim of the Bill is partly to reduce those risks.

However no one has ever worked out the true costs associated with not using nuclear power. No one has worked out the costs of pollution and its effect on the lives of people living near non-nuclear power stations. No one has ever worked out the costs of cleaning up after coal mining. Planning applications have been made in my constituency for cleaning up many worked-out coal mine sites. The cost is horrendous. No one has worked out the costs of deaths in the coal mining industry.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North mentioned Chernobyl. It is entirely appropriate that we should think about such matters now, on the fifth anniversary of that dreadful disaster. She mentioned Three Mile island. She did not mention the two young men who died in the roof fall in a coal mine in my constituency not long ago. She did not mention the 24-year-old man who was pulled out after the accident minus his foot. The hon. Lady went on about unexpected explosions. She did not mention that most of the coal mines in her area and mine were subject to spontaneous combustion for many years. She did not mention that one of the results of that was an 18-month underground fire in the south Derbyshire and north-west Leicestershire coalfield. That caused a lot of fear and worry partly becauses it manifested itself to everyone in the neighbourhood. The constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) dug up their potatoes from their allotments ready roasted. That is what the coal industry does. My constituents have walked away from that industry without a backward glance.

We have an old power industry in my area, the coal industry, which is facing decline. We also have a new industry, the nuclear power industry, which I am sure will take the place of the old one.

In the years to come as, with the help of this Bill, material is transported by road through my constituency according to the highest possible standards—the Bill establishes standards which are world leaders—Rolls-Royce and Associates will not just put its nuclear power packs just into submarines but will adapt them for domestic and commercial use. I am happy to predict that the day will come when from the start we shall provide how equipment for nuclear power is to be transported, how it is to be inserted, perhaps buried in the ground, and how the disposal procedures are to operate so that many problems associated with the industry will no longer cause anx[illegible].

We now have half a century of experience of using and transporting nuclear materials in this country and abroad. Naturally, there are risks. It is not possible to wrench energy from nature without some sort of risk. The Bill is an intelligent and sophisticated part of the world's efforts to reduce that risk, and I commend it and my hon. Friend's efforts.

10.30 am

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I join my colleagues in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) on having the good fortune to come so high in the ballot and on his choice of Bill. I am particularly pleased because I canvassed for him before he was elected at that great by-election victory in his constituency. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), I apologise for the fact that I was unable to be present on Second Reading.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on piloting his Bill so expeditiously through Committee. As he said, the Committee sitting started at 10.30 am and ended eight minutes later, at 22 minutes to 11 o'clock. An even greater achievement was that he managed to get the Bill through Committee unamended. That must be a tribute to his eloquence and good standing. As one who has always believed in financial rectitude, I am impressed that he did not draw the £200 that is available to Members who introduce a private Member's Bill: His career in this place will prosper. I should like to see him eventually moving with those attributes to the Treasury.

All hon. Members will owe my hon. Friend a great debt on behalf of their constituents. The transport of radioactive materials is important and the general public are anxious that it should be carried out under maximum safety regulations. I understand that there is a large number of shipments a year and perhaps my hon. Friend will clarify how many. I noticed that a figure of 300,000 was mentioned in Committee, whereas 500,000 was given on Second Reading. That is a material difference and it would be helpful if my hon. Friend could clarify the matter when he replies to the debate.

The shipments range from nuclear waste to medical isotopes and sometimes go to ferries for export, to airports or to hospitals. My constituency is adjacent to the ferry terminals in Hull from where North Sea Ferries operates five ferries a day to Zeebrugge and Rotterdam. My home town of Hull, which used to be the country's third port but which declined year after year because of the national dock labour scheme until it was no longer in the first 10, is benefiting from this Government's wisdom in abolishing the National Dock Labour Board. As a result, traffic through the port is increasing rapidly.

Some of the 300,000 or 500,000 shipments, whichever is the correct figure, will undoubtedly travel along roads in my constituency, so my constituents are particularly grateful for the Bill. They have considerable experience of vehicles carrying hazardous loads travelling on our local roads because we have a large chemicals plant near the ferry terminal, at Saltend, We also have North sea gas terminals and a certain amount of hazardous material is transported to them. Therefore, road safety in relation to hazardous loads is a high priority in their minds.

Clearly radioactive materials are most hazardous loads. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South that people sometimes get carried away and go over the top when talking about nuclear waste. Therefore, my constituents believe that there should be strict controls and safety regulations.

The present controls are derived from the Radioactive Substances Act 1948 and are now inadequate. The United Kingdom is a member of the International Atomic Energy Agency which is centred in Vienna and is a specialist agency of the United Nations. As members of that important body, we are bound by its rules. As it has insisted that all its members should have more up-to-date regulations to control the transport of nuclear materials by road, my hon. Friend's Bill is opportune and appropriate.

It has been mentioned that the Bill should have passed through the House last year. It would have done but for a technical hitch. Clearly it has the support of the Government. My hon. Friend has been public spirited in giving his slot high in the ballot over to a Bill which is of such public importance.

As my hon. Friend said, it is an enabling Bill. It allows the Department of Transport as the competent authority to make regulations, which the Minister will be able to keep up to date, and to respond to further regulations issued by the IAEA in Vienna.

Clause 2 sets out all the subjects to be covered by the regulations. My constituents will be particularly relieved that under clause 2(1)(a) the Secretary of State may make regulations "to prevent any injury to health, or any damage to property or to the environment, being caused by, or by an incident arising out of, the transport of radioactive material".

I particularly support clause 2(2)(a) which concerns

"the design of packaging for radioactive material and the manufacture and maintenance of packaging components"

That is important because the public need to be assured that, if there is an accident involving a vehicle carrying radioactive materials, there is no possibility of that packaging being damaged to the extent that radioactive materials could leak from the vehicle and contaminate people or goods. The packaging therefore must comply with strict design specifications so that it can withstand any impact that it is likely to receive as a result of a serious road accident.

Clause 2(2)(b) relates to clear labelling. That is also important, because, in the event of an accident, it is necessary for the emergency services to be aware of the problem that they may face. Given the nature of radioactive materials, it is equally important that their storage and handling, as well as their transportation, are strictly regulated.

Clause 2(2)(c) relates to

"the placarding of vehicles used to transport such packages"

That is important for two reasons: to aid the emergency services—the police and fire service—in the event of an accident; and to reassure the public. The public are frightened of hazardous materials being carried in secret. It is therefore important that hazardous loads are clearly marked when transported.

Clause 2(2)(d) relates to

"the keeping of records and the furnishing of information".

That is important not only for reasons of safety but for public confidence. It must be right that any person who contravenes or fails to comply with any regulation made by the Secretary of State should be guilty of an offence —it could well be a serious one.

Clause 3 relates to prohibitions and directions. It must be correct for an inspector or an examiner to have the right to prohibit the driving of a vehicle which has been used to carry radioactive materials or packages if either that vehicle or any radioactive package carried in it fails to comply with the regulations made by the Secretary of State.

It is right that clause 3(1)(b) should enable an inspector or examiner to prohibit the driving of a vehicle if "the vehicle, or any radioactive package which is or was being transported by it, has been involved in an accident".

The inspector or an examiner has a similar right under clause 3(1)(c) if "any radioactive package which was being transported by the vehicle, or any radioactive material which was contained in such a package, has been lost or stolen"

It is vital that such dangerous materials should be transported in properly designed packages. It is therefore important for an inspector to have the power available to him in clause 3(2) to prohibit the transport of any radioactive package that he believes has failed to comply with the regulations made by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Holt: My hon. Friend has spoken specifically about the design of the packaging and the safety of the vehicle, but are there any constraints in the Bill relating to the person who will drive that vehicle? If a person passed his heavy goods vehicle driving test 15 or 20 years ago—before he had his bronchitis, arthritis and his eyesight started to deteriorate—would he still be allowed to get behind the wheel of a vehicle transporting radioactive material? Are there no controls over such a person? If not, that is a weakness in the Bill which we should consider, even at this stage. We should ensure not only that the packaging and the vehicle are right, so that people are happy, but that the drivers are right. After all, most accidents occur as a result of human failure.

Mr. Townend: My hon. Friend raises a pertinent point which I do not believe has been dealt with in the Bill. It is a pity that my hon. Friend was not on the Committee as he might have tabled a relevant amendment. No doubt when my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington replies to the debate he will he tell my hon. Friend whether he has considered that point and whether there are particular reasons why there is no specific clause on that matter in the Bill. There is no doubt that it is no good going to all the expense of introducing safeguards for the packaging and labelling of the radioactive materials and the placarding of the vehicles if there are no strict controls over those who can drive the vehicles. That matter should be considered.

I want to make progress as I know that there is another important Bill before the House today. [HON. MEMBERS: "Keep going".] I am pleased that hon. Members find my speech so fascinating and want me to continue. I shall do my best to oblige.

If an accident occurs, the first requirement is to ensure the safety of the public and for that reason clause 3(4) is essential. It is vital that the inspector should have the power to remove a vehicle to a safe place. Subsection (4) states:

"Where an inspector or examiner imposes a prohibition under subsection (1) above, he may also by a direction in writing require the person in charge of the vehicle to remove it (and, if it is motor vehicle drawing a trailer, also to remove the trailer) to such place and subject to such conditions as are specified in the direction; and the prohibition shall not apply to the removal of the vehicle or trailer in accordance with the direction."

That is an important power.

I have one further question to put to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington which I hope he can clarify. Does the Bill apply to Scotland? I notice that Northern Ireland is mentioned and has been dealt with separately, but it is vital that the Bill should apply to Scotland. I know that we have the queer situation in this place where sometimes we have to produce separate Bills for the two countries.

When one imposes regulations, one must also consider the possibility of their being breached. In a serious situation involving health and safety the penalties for a breach of the regulations should not be insignificant. Clause 6(2) provides:

"Any person guilty of an offence under section 5(5) above shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale."

I am not sure what that level is, but I hope that that fine is substantial as it is important that the regulations are complied with because we need to keep public confidence in the transportation of radioactive material.

Clause 6(3) states:

"Any person guilty of any other offence under this Act shall be liable—

(a) on conviction on indictment, to a fine or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to both;"

That seems a reasonably stiff penalty. Subsection (3)(b) sets down the penalty on summary conviction as "a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two months or to both"

Subsection (4) provides:

"The court by or before which any person is convicted of an offence under section 2(4) or 3(8) above in respect of any radioactive material may order the material to be destroyed or disposed of and any expenses reasonably incurred in connection with the destruction or disposal to be defrayed by that person."

I was rather amused by clause 7, which reads:

"Any expenses incurred by the Secretary of State in consequence of the provisions of this Act shall be payable out of money provided by Parliament."

I have not noticed whether that provision is in every Act, but it seems strange. Nobody would expect the Secretary of State to pay out of his own pocket the money spent as a consequence of the Act's provisions.

I shall close by saying that I am convinced——

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): It would be helpful if the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) put it on record that his real interest is not in this Bill but in the one that follows. The following Bill is an important animal welfare measure to which the hon. Gentleman takes exception. Will he explain why he did not attend the Second Reading debate, which involved only a six-minute speech, and why he did not attend the Committee where the proceedings were completed in eight minutes? Will he also explain why he has not tabled any amendments up to Third Reading but has now made the longest speech on the Bill? Will he confirm that he has no interest in the Bill but merely seeks to delay proceedings so that he can kill the animal welfare measure?

Mr. Townend: The hon. Member is most presumptuous. He cannot have heard my speech. I apologised—as did my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South—for not being able to be present for the Second Reading debate as I had constituency engagements. On Fridays most hon. Members have engagements.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the next important Bill. If he looks behind him, he will see that there is nobody there. Therefore, the Bill cannot be that important to the Labour party. If the hon. Gentleman had listened to my speech, he would have understood that, as busy roads from the ferry terminal and from the port of Hull run through my constituency, I have a legitimate constituency interest in this Bill. Because of the important chemical works and North sea gas terminals in my constituency, my constituents are more aware than those of most right hon. and hon. Members of the dangers of carrying hazardous materials.

The hon. Gentleman is right: I have a great interest in the next Bill because my constituency has the largest concentration of pig farmers in the country. If that Bill is passed, many of them will go bankrupt, so I am also here for that Bill. However, the hon. Gentleman was wrong and presumptuous to say—or to insinuate—that I have no interest in this Bill or no right to speak on it. He went over the top when he spoke about attendance at the Committee. He knows as well as I do how rarely hon. Members who are not members of Committees attend those Committees.

Mr. Ron Davies: The record is accurate. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I was listening to his speech at the Bar of the House and I followed his arguments carefully. I did not suggest that he had no right to speak on the Bill. I recognise and uphold that right. I was questioning his motives rather than his right. I am grateful that he has confirmed his objection and his wish to kill the animal welfare measure which follows the Bill.

I accept the hon. Gentleman's assertion that he has an important constituency interest. I should have thought that his cause and the interests of his constituents would best be served by bringing the debate to a close so that we can proceed to Third Reading and hasten the Bill's passage into law.

Mr. Townend: Again, the hon. Gentleman is presumptuous. If my hon. Friend the Member for Boston and Spalding——

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): Not Spalding anymore.

Mr. Townend: If my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) listens to my amendments and has a heart for the poor pig farmers in my constituency, he will accept them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must not anticipate debates that may come later.

Mr. Townend: I apologise, but, with respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) accused me of having said that I wished to kill the Bill. I did not say that. I am saying that, if the amendments were accepted, I should be happy to vote for the Bill because they would mean that our pig farmers would not be at a disadvantage compared with European pig farmers.

It is important for my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington to see that all hon. Members who vote, vote for the Bill. I shall give him the opportunity to see that by calling a Division. I am convinced that the Bill will be passed and I do not expect anybody to vote against it. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington. After a relatively short time in Parliament, he will have made a small piece of parliamentary history by having successfully introduced and steered the Fishburn Bill through the House.

I strongly support the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South about the importance of nuclear energy. There is no doubt that the industrial revival in France is very much based on cheap energy which comes mainly from nuclear power. As she said, as we advance into the nuclear age, the safe transportation of nuclear waste will become increasingly important. In a few years the people who do not realise it now will realise then what an important contribution the Bill will have made. There is no doubt that many people in this country have suffered from hydrocarbon fuels. We know the problems about coal mines which my hon. Friend mentioned.

I shall not detain the House any longer as we have important business to do, but again I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington.

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Christopher Chope): If I correctly detect the feeling in the House, it is that we should move as quickly as possible to conclude Third Reading.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) on successfully steering the Bill to Third Reading and confirm the Government's full support for his efforts. It is an important Bill and, were it not for my hon. Friend's generosity in giving up his place in the private Members' ballot for this measure, we should not have been guaranteed that it would be on the statute book this Session.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) raised a number of issues. She explained to me that she must attend a constituency engagement—as I, too, must do shortly—so I shall write to her with the details of those issues. However, most of them were irrelevant to the core of the Bill. She was especially interested in the issue of inspectors. At the first stage, there will be approximately 10 inspectors and 215 traffic examiners. That is the correct level of enforcement to begin with, but it will be kept under review. I have great pleasure in commending the Bill to the House.

10.59 am

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) on introducing the Bill. However, he has done so on behalf of the Government. With respect, I must say that this is not a private Member's Bill; it is a piece of Government legislation. As it is a piece of Government legislation, we should be debating it not on a Friday morning, but properly in Government time. It should be introduced by a Minister and opposed by the Opposition and we should debate it in that context. Although it may have been slightly offensive to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) made a contribution, we must put it on record that although we congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington on getting a Bill through the House of Commons, we believe that it is not a private Member's Bill, but Government legislation. Is it good or bad Government legislation?

Guy's Hospital

11 am

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, of which I have given you notice. Will a Health Minister make a statement to the House about the cut of 600 jobs at Guy's hospital? Will anyone take responsibility for that, or is the Government's attitude, "Guy's? It has opted out and is nothing to do with us any more"? Will you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, use your influence to bring a Minister to the House to answer for the shortage of funds that has led to the jobs being axed, or is it the case that now that Guy's has opted out, the only accountability is to the balance sheet, not to the patients or the local community? The Prime Minister is to have a health summit tomorrow. Scrapping the national health service changes must be at the top of his agenda.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It would be helpful if you could tell the House whether you have been given any idea of the Government's response to the knowledge that they were given this morning that requests were being made for Ministers to come to the House to answer the complaints about the sudden announcement of the cuts at Guy's hospital, which is in my constituency.

The case raises an issue for the first time. It is the first such announcement since self-governing hospital trusts came into operation on 1 April. The constitutional problem may be that Ministers are reluctant to come to the House because they are suddenly saying that they are no longer answerable for self-governing hospital trusts. If that is why the Secretary of State or his Ministers are not here —I understand that although the Secretary of State may not be in London, Ministers are in the Department today —it cannot be right.

The argument for self-government is that the hospital is now directly accountable to the Government and that the local health authority has been cut out. The House needs an assurance that at the least on Monday if not today, because we must give the Government the opportunity to get their argument together, given that they will meet at Chequers tomorrow to discuss health service policy, the Secretary of State will come to the House to explain how it is possible for 600 jobs, one eighth of the work force, to go from the local hospital without a reduction in care for the community.

I am often in the hospital——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is raising a point of order. He cannot go into the merits of the case, especially during private Members' time.

Mr. Hughes: I will be brief. Ministers need to come to the House because the statement made on behalf of the hospital yesterday—not publicly, as there has been no communication with elected representatives and no alerting of local Members of Parliament—is that there will be no reduction in care. It has even been said that the cuts are being made to advance the care of the patients. That cannot be true. Someone must explain to the House how it is possible for employees of the public health service to make what is clearly a misleading statement from which many people are likely to suffer. If we can have an announcement today that there will be a statement on Monday, it will at least be possible to question the Secretary of State on what could be a matter of precedent affecting many people, many hospitals and many workers in the health service throughout England and Wales.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): The self-governing trust to which hon. Members have referred is Guy's and Lewisham, so the cuts affect Lewisham hospital in my constituency. I have had no notice of the cuts and I have not been consulted. I wish to add to the call made by my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) for a statement in the House so that we may question Ministers.

In Lewisham, we face the closure of Sydenham children's hospital and the moving of its facilities to our site. Will that be placed in jeopardy? Will phase 2 of our hospital be placed in jeopardy? We cannot tell, but we are told that the cuts are across the board. A 10 per cent. cut in staff at Lewisham hospital would be extremely deleterious to our health services. As my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham said, Ministers must be made responsible for the action. I beg you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to use your good offices to ensure that Ministers come to the House either today or another day to answer for what will be, I am sure, a severe reduction in the health services available to my constituents.

Mr. John Townend rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman speaking on the same point of order?

Mr. Townend: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Please speak very briefly because we are cutting into private Members' time.

Mr. Townend: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. These things happen all the time. One should not always accept the idea that because staff are cut, services will be cut. One might consider the catering side of hospitals——

Ms. Ruddock: This is not a point of order.

Mr. Townend: It is a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot debate the matter now. If the hon. Gentleman has a point of order for me, I will hear it.

Mr. Townend: It is quite unreasonable for the Opposition to demand on a Friday that a Minister should come to the House. There is no urgency in the matter. A Minister could easily make a statement next week. There is no urgency for a statement to be made before the weekend. Ministers are supposed to be running the country, so it would be inconvenient for them to come to the House today. The demand is unnecessary.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I speak as Chairman of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. I recall that the trusts were established by delegated powers. As far as I can recall, there were no provisions in that delegated legislation for the removal of parliamentary accountability and the responsibility of Ministers to make statements to the House when there were such enormous, cataclysmic and catastrophic announcements of 600 redundancies at a given hospital. I thought, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that if you were making inquiries on behalf of the House, which is anxious to have a statement from the Government, it should be borne in mind that Ministers still have responsibility for the catastrophe.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There has been no request for a statement on the matter, but no doubt what has been said will have been heard by members of the Government Front Bench. The hon. Members concerned will be able to seek other opportunities to raise the matter.

Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill

Mr. Holt: I drove past Guy's hospital this morning and I was amazed by the amount of capital building work that is going on there. Having seen that and then having listened to remarks about 600 job cuts did not make sense to me. However, I should be told off by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I digressed for one minute from the Bill.

I have already congratulated my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington and I was making the point that the Bill was really Government legislation. As such, coming on a Friday, it interferes with genuine private Members' time. The Bill will not be subjected, as was the Bill concerning the Tees and Hartlepool port authority which I sponsored, to being thrown out on the capricious whim of a few Members of the other place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington drew attention to his constituency in relation to the transportation of atomic waste. I represent Teesside, where the chemical industry is at the heart of what we do. We have tremendous problems. We have the largest fire service in the country. Recently we have been involved in detailed and long talks over the marking of all the vehicles that come into Teesside from all round the world. In Cleveland, we used the British marking while everyone else used the European standard marking. The Government urged us to go over to the European model. We tried to convince the Minister that the signs used in this country, and widely accepted in this and some other countries, were better than European signs and that argument raged over the transportation of chemicals. Will we have the same arguments over the movement of atomic waste, raw materials, isotopes and so on? If so, we could find ourselves in an expensive bargaining game.

It is all very well to have before us this type of Bill, either privately or supported by the Government, but I wonder how long it will be before the European legislature decides to impose its own rules, regulations and markings and whether we shall have to change all over again. In those circumstances, it might have been wise to leave the matter until the Europeans have determined the issue, in the same context as the movement of chemical and hazardous materials in the Teesside area.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington referred to people's perceptions and feelings about atomic waste and atomic power stations. On Teesside we have Hartlepool power station, which is producing electricity cheaply for distribution on the national grid. It is an excellent power station. I recall not long ago the people responsible for the welfare and well-being of the toughest youngsters in the Durham area—those who in old-fashioned terms would have been called borstal boys—taking a group on a visit to Hartlepool atomic power station.

The tough lads and lassies were ushered into a bus in Durham and transported a few miles to Hartlepool. It was found, on arriving at the power station, that the youngsters would not leave the bus. Although only a few brick walls lay between the bus and the power station, they did not want to go in. It was as though they were near Chernobyl. Although they were told that they were at no risk, their perception was such—the same applies to many members of the public—they did not like the idea of being at the power station.

Such is the aura surrounding atomic energy and we must remove that fear. One way to do that is through the type of measure that is before the House today. We must constantly examine and update legislation. Much has happened between 1947 and 1991. If we do not re-educate the public in this matter, as my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) said, we shall fall behind our European competitors, particularly France, in the provision of cheap electricity.

The British furniture industry, for which I speak in the House, recently had new legislation imposed on it for fire prevention which involved the use of new types of foam in upholstered furniture. The result is that, at great expense, all furniture manufacturers in Britain have installed new equipment and employed new production methods. We are now producing furniture which is safer than furniture produced anywhere else on the continent.

Yet the European Parliament is about to introduce new regulations affecting furniture manufacturing. That will involve foam, chemicals and all other matters used in that industry, but the new European regulations will not be as strict as those that now exist in Britain. That puts the Minister in a dichotomy; does he uphold our stronger laws or accede to instructions from Brussels?

If, having passed this Bill, the same happens over the movement of atomic waste, we shall find ourselves in a legislative maelstrom. Indeed, we might as well have stayed, legislatively, where we were in 1947. Have the changes that we have made over the years given us the best that we could have? Even at this stage of the Bill, I question whether my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, acting on behalf of the Government, or even the Government themselves, have thought through the whole question of the marking of vehicles.

It is important to know what consideration the Government have given to controls that may be imposed on the drivers of the vehicles involved. For example, will there be an age limit and will drivers need medical examinations, including regular eye tests? It is all very well to say that a vehicle must have an MOT test every few years to ensure that its tyres, gears and so on are in good working order and that it has all the necessary equipment. But what about the human beings who drive the vehicles?

Our experience on Teesside, which involves the movement of many chemical lorries, is that invariably accidents occur not through mechanical failure but through human error. Sometimes the roads are slippery, but all too often accidents occur through human error such as tiredness or lack of concentration, or because drivers have been listening to the radio or thinking about last night's football match or episode of "Eastenders". As a result of the multitude of matters that go through people's minds, accidents occur.

When there is a chemical accident on Teesside, there is a major alert and all the emergency services immediately go into action. I fear that hellish travel and traffic problems also occur. Indeed, in a recent accident on the main roundabout on the A19, traffic was held up for many hours. That involved the spillage of only a small amount of toxic material, but we cannot afford to take chances with the movement of toxic, dangerous and nuclear material.

We have a debt to the general public. That has led my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington to introduce the Bill, although hon. Members will agree that we were not over-convinced by the Minister's contribution. Could we have been convinced by Government explanation, apology and enlightenment involving only one and a half minutes of explanation from the Minister?

Mr. John Townend: Does my hon. Friend feel that a covert deal has been done by the Minister? He did not give a proper reply to the debate or answer the questions that were put to him. Could that be because he is anxious to get on to the next debate, the Government having decided to back the Bill which will cause many problems for my pig farmers? I have been accused by the Opposition of manoeuvring. Does my hon. Friend think that this is a case of parliamentary manoeuvring?

Mr. Holt: My hon. Friend tempts me to discuss that issue, but would he expect me to ascribe such motives to the Minister? Heaven forbid that a Minister would do anything that could be called gerrymandering——

Mr. Ron Davies: Does the hon. Gentleman mean filibustering rather than gerrymandering?

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, which shows that he is more familiar than I am with the use of such words.

Mr. John Townend: My hon. Friend represents a constituency which contains many chemical works. Has he had problems on the roads over the transportation of hazardous loads and are his constituents as worried as mine about such matters and do they require reassurance? Is it likely that loads of nuclear waste will be transported through his constituency?

Mr. Holt: That reminds me that I should put on record the fact that I am a director of a chemical company with production units on the river in Teesside. Therefore, I have much first-hand knowledge of the chemical industry and know what we must consider by way of environmental practices. Without a shadow of a doubt, my company's No. 1 priority is safety and I believe that to be true of ICI and all the other major chemical companies in Teesside. On my visits to various chemical companies, I have always made a point of meeting the transport manager and seeing the safety experts because there is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) said, a widespread fear and concern that we are dealing with material that is liable to be volatile at any time. There is also a power station in the constituency.

Sir Richard Body: Will my hon. Friend give hon. Members some guidance on what they should do in the forthcoming Division for which my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) has said he will call and for which Tellers will be provided? Will my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) vote against the Bill? Does he feel that the Bill goes far enough? Will he give us guidance on which way we should vote because, in view of what he said earlier, it seems that some of us should be persuaded to vote against the Bill when my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington presses it to a Division?

Mr. Holt: My hon. Friend will have to be patient. When one learns how this place works, one often finds that as more and more legislation progresses, hon. Members take more interest. There is so much legislation that they cannot always be fully aware of and involved in every detail.

Mr. Ron Davies: If the hon. Gentleman does not know the difference between gerrymandering and filibustering, he should be reticent about giving advice on matters procedural to the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body).

Mr. Holt: I did not give my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) any advice. I took on board the point of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), that it would have been presumptious for me to give advice to my hon. Friend who, I know, is interested in this debate. However, I do not think that my hon. Friend has too many power stations using atomic energy or many chemical works in his constituency. But I am grateful to him for being here.

Sir Richard Body: The railway system in my constituency is being used for the transportation of these dangerous materials, which has caused great anxiety.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington is against the Bill and proposes to press for a Division. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaugh support my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington in his opposition to the Bill?

Mr. Holt: I repeat that my hon. Friend must be patient. We shall all find out what I am going to do at the end of the debate, when I shall say which way I shall lead the House on Third Reading.

Mr. John Townend: Does my hon. Friend agree that there has been some presumptuousness in the House today? My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) will have to wait and see what happens at the end of the debate and see how I vote.

Mr. Holt: We shall all have to wait and see how we vote. The important thing is to see how many people vote. We shall have to see whether the Government, as this is their Bill, have managed to persuade the payroll to materialise out of the woodwork and present themselves in the Lobby on a Friday, or whether this is genuinely a one-line Whip day, when the wishes of Back-Benchers prevail, not the Executive.

I have a sneaking feeling, because I have not been contradicted in the suggestions that I have made three or four times, that this is Government legislation. As it is Government legislation, I feel reasonably confident that the Government will have done something in the background to bring in hon. Members. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston would like to ask all of them how they are going to vote, how they made up their minds how they were going to vote and which salient points of the debate they took on board? Perhaps they were influenced by a telephone call from the Whip telling them to be here and support the Government legislation on Friday morning. I doubt whether those people have listened to the arguments in the debate or made up their own minds. I freely admit that that is my practice on most Fridays when I vote. That is the way in which the vast majority of hon. Members make up their minds on many pieces of legislation on which they vote day in, day out, vote in, vote out because that is how this place operates. I shall tell my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston which way I shall vote later.

It is worth noting that, while people come out of the woodwork to speak on points of order on a London hospital, there are no Liberals or Labour Members present, except one Labour shadow spokesman, for this debate, which is about the movement of atomic material. When people come to my glorious constituency and drive along the road to Teeside they come across a sign saying "Nuclear Free Zone" put up by Labour-controlled Cleveland county council. That means that the nuclear power station at Hartlepool must be a figment of our imagination.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am finding it difficult to relate what the hon. Gentleman is saying to the Bill. We are on Third Reading and the debate should be restricted to what is in the Bill.

Mr. Holt: I am talking about the tranportation by road of nuclear waste material. It will be transported by a lorry that has been tested, has proper tyres and has undergone an oil change. That lorry will be driven up the A19 and could be involved in an accident. When the driver comes across the "Nuclear Free Zone" sign will the lorry shudder to a stop as he puts on the brakes? Does the Bill tell the lorry driver what to do when he comes to that sign on his way to or from Hartlepool power station to take nuclear material in or out? The Bill does not. It states that the lorry must be in good order and the packaging must be right, but it does not say anything about the man or woman driving the vehicle—but it is a piece of Government legislation.

Having enjoyed being a nuclear-free zone for so long under the loonies, the London borough of Brent has now done away with the nuclear-free zone signs. The last of the signs was recently installed in the civil museum in Brent to mark the passing of the loony left and the signs in that borough. Unfortunately, Cleveland is still controlled by the loony left Labour local authority, which has a right to determine the movement of nuclear material by road and train.

My hon. Friend mentioned that trains, possibly with nuclear material on board, pass through his constituency. I wonder who knows which trains have nuclear material on board. Are there special signs? It appears that, in the Bill, the Government have omitted to mention anything relating to trains.

Mr. John Townend: My hon. Friend must have misheard me. I did not mention trains passing through my constituency. I was worried about the transportation by road of such waste in my constituency.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Bill clearly deals with transport by road and it would be out of order to refer to any other form of transport.

Mr. Holt: I accept that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I was drawn along that path by my hon. Friend the Member for Holland and Boston. I was seeking only to answer his point about trains carrying radioactive material passing through his constituency. Perhaps the fact that the Bill relates only to roads is one of its defects. It will be undermined by forthcoming European legislation, which will relate to all the transportation systems for such material. It may not be long before the Government have to return to the House with another Bill. Will that be on a Friday? Will they ask some hon. Member who is lucky enough to have come high in the ballot to adopt it as a private Member's Bill?

I am not really knocking the fact that the Government behave in that way. On occasions, I am glad that Government Bills go through the private Member's Bill route on a Friday. I was here not many Fridays ago when the House debated another Government-inspired and sponsored Bill to provide for vending machines and television sets in betting shops. That came through the door——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must deal with the Bill. It is my job to protect the business of the House and the hon. Gentleman must keep in order. He must relate his remarks directly to what is in the Bill.

Mr. Holt: I accept that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have listened to the whole of the debate and I am simply trying to discuss some points that have already been made. My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South referred to her cottage in the Loire valley and said that the atomic power stations there did not create dust. She was in order——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman will recollect that I stopped the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) at that point.

Mr. Holt: Your memory is better than mine, Mr. Deputy Speaker—you did stop my hon. Friend. That was when I intervened to remind the House of what happened when the Swedish Government changed their policy on the use of atomic power stations.

My hon. Friend for Kensington moved the Third Reading with alacrity and smoothness, but nowhere near that shown by my hon. Friend the Minister. The manner in which he responded and the fact that he added nothing to the reasons why the Bill is being dealt with in this way made me think that perhaps he had a heavy pressing engagement outside the House. Hon. Members who participate in debates on a Friday—including my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston—want to know why people vote in a particular way. Because my hon. Friend the Minister has left, he cannot intervene in my speech and answer some of my legitimate questions. What about other forms of transportation for atomic and dangerous materials? Will sufficient roads be built? Will roads be identified as priority routes on which the hazardous material must be transported? Will certain roads be banned for the transportation of such material? Can only specific vehicles be used to carry such material, or will any vehicle be permitted provided that the packaging, as set out in the Bill, is correct?

Was not it discouraging to see on our television sets during the past few days that those who transport atomic warheads have been highly criticised by an independent body—not the Opposition; a body far more learned and thorough? That had Government support, as the Bill has Government support. I have a responsibility to my constituents to be absolutely sure, before I vote on proposed legislation, that it is in their best interests. I am not convinced that the Bill is in their best interests, especially in view of the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister. Of course, if I were to be polite, I would refer to his lack of speech. He did not answer any of the points made. He has gone and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—who is waiting for the next debate—is holding the seat on the Treasury Bench. I doubt whether an Agriculture Minister would wish to intervene in a road transport debate.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Maclean): My hon. Friend is being uncharacteristically unfair. I urged my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic to leave so that he could fulfil his important engagements. Before he did so, he gave an undertaking to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley)—who has also left to fulfil engagements—that he would write to her on any detailed points. This is a Third Reading debate and I feel that my hon. Friend's speech was more than adequate, especially as the Bill was exhaustively discussed during earlier stages.

My hon. Friend the Minister would be pleased to write to my hon. Friend for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) on any technical or detailed points. I confirm that my hon. Friend the Minister concluded his speech by saying that the Government support the Bill.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, but the fact is that the Minister responsible has left. That underlines my earlier point that Government legislation on a Friday is wrong, especially if Ministers have previous engagements that take them away in the middle of the debate when hon. Members are making their points. I do not make a slur on my hon. Friend; perhaps it is a problem with the way in which the Government organise the business of the House. I am not being personally critical; I am criticising the way in which the system works. I accept the assurance that my points about the roads in my constituency will receive a written reply. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is a most courteous and diligent man, but that does not detract from my argument that Ministers should be in the Chamber to reply, not just to hold the seat.

I return to the question of my constituency—its roads, the road patterns and the vehicles that will be carrying the hazardous material. We will not always know what the vehicles are carrying. We do not know what the markings regulations will be. Langbaurgh has been waiting since 1938 for bypass for the market town of Guisborough. If vehicles carrying hazardous waste have to go through Guisborough, until the bypass is built, my constituents will be worried. The vehicles will have to pass through a busy market town with markets on both sides of an old cobbled street, with a steep, sharp bend at one end. We have been waiting for the bypass and perhaps we should have one before such materials are allowed to travel through Cleveland in road vehicles, however well protected the materials and however young, fit and able are the drivers, or however good their eyesight.

If the Minister were here, I would have mentioned to him the fact that Guisborough almost has a bypass. A few months ago a new stretch of dual carriageway spur road came along, stretching from one part of my constituency to the outskirts of Guisborough. A lovely roundabout was built and 20 ft of brand new roadway leads off it. One day that will be a bypass.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman once more that we are talking about the transport by road of radioactive materials. We are not talking about road works.

Mr. Holt: They cannot be transported by road if we have not got the roads, and I am trying to argue that case.

[Mr. Holt]

To transport such materials through my constituency, as provided for in the Bill, roads need to be built and that bypass needs to be built.

Perhaps that subject is on the fringe of being out of order, but it is a road—or to be precise it is not a road, because it has not been built yet, as is the case with the Brotton bypass, which we should have but which we do not have——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought for one moment that the hon. Gentleman was about to be very helpful. He virtually admitted that he was out of order. I ask for his co-operation to ensure that his remarks are in order.

Mr. Holt: I take your point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was skirting close to the edge of the road and I am carrying no hazard warning signs; if I were, they would be out of order as far as the European Commission is concerned.

This is a serious matter and perhaps I have treated it with a little levity. However, it is important that, when Parliament is asked to pass legislation, it is given all the information that it requires. I am not sure that we should be proud to say that in Committee we got rid of the Bill in six minutes or 12 minutes, or whatever the figure was, or that it had a thorough, detailed investigation there.

On Third Reading we are not necessarily able to go into all the ramifications, but can only say whether we approve or disapprove and vote for or against the Bill. However, it remains incumbent upon us to probe and to look for answers from Ministers.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, the promoter of the Bill, were a member of the Government it would be different. I wish him well and I hope that he soon is, as his talents lie in that direction. However, at the moment he is not in a position to answer for the Government.

Sir Richard Body: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his stamina, because he has succeeded in killing off the subsequent legislation for this afternoon, which is quite an achievement, given the paucity of matter for debate in the Bill. Is he aware that during his speech he has driven out of the Chamber everyone who came to the House concerned with the Bill other than its promoter, my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn)? That is a remarkable achievement for which he deserves to be doubly congratulated, because there is no one on either Front Bench who is concerned with the Bill—they have all gone. Everyone else has gone, because they are satisfied with the Bill. True my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) is here. We are fascinated to discover whether he will support the Bill. He has said that he will call a Division, no doubt because he is against it, although everyone else seems to be in favour.

Given all those facts, does not my hon. Friend consider that, having succeeded in killing off the subsequent legislation, we might now be spared too much detail about the necessary road works in his constituency and about some of the other matters that we have been hearing about for some time? Now that he has achieved his objective, could he not sum up his essential arguments as to why he objects to the Third Reading of this Bill?

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because he has given me one or two thoughts that had not occurred to me. That enables me to remind my hon. Friend that I have not driven anyone anywhere. My hon. Friend is still here. The hon. Member for Bridlington is still here; I have not driven him away.

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): Is it in order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) to go on for 45 minutes, talking like a five-year-old schoolboy, and for him deliberately to obstruct a Bill that many hon. Members have stayed here this morning to see brought into legislative effect—an animal welfare measure that many people in this country want? Is he not ashamed of himself? Would you order him to bring his remarks to a close?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As long as the hon. Gentleman is in order, he is entitled to address the House, but he is having quite a job keeping in order.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I want to answer some of the questions asked during this debate, questions which were obviously in order because they were not ruled out of order.

May I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Holland upon Boston that he need not worry about my stamina because I was here for the entire 14 hours during which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), myself and one or two other hon. Members managed to talk, quite conclusively and within the rules of the House, about putting fluoride in water. I believe that that was the longest speech on record by any hon. Member and that it is recorded in the "Guinness Book of Records". I was here for the entire 14-hour debate. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me of that because I had forgotten about it.

Allowing for interventions and points of order, and for giving way so generously on so many occasions, I do not think that I have spoken for long. If I have changed the direction of Parliament or have moved legislation in one way or another in such a short time, it is quite an achievement. Perhaps if I keep going for a little longer on the Bill, legislation may well be the better for it.

However, I do not want to travel along those roads, even on a road Bill, if it causes you to bring me to order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or to tell me that I am stretching the patience of the Chair and of the House. If you tell me that something is out of order, I respect that and come back to the subject as quickly as I can. I am a little tangential from time to time because my hon. Friend—but I see that he has gone. My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston says things that tempt me on to subjects for which I do not even have a note. I had not anticipated that. Sometimes I have to reflect for a moment about interjections. Earlier my hon. Friend the Minister made a helpful interjection.

I am concerned that there are fears for animal welfare. I did not know that there were any atomic animals as yet. Many people have views on the transportation of atomic materials and many people have expressed strong views in the past about anything to do with radioactive waste.

Sometimes it is when a seemingly short, two-paragraph Bill is before us that important legislation is passed. It is incumbent on hon. Members with constituencies close to a power station where hazardous materials and toxic waste may be transported on the roads continually, day in and day out, night after night, seven days a week to consider the Bill. I wonder whether there is any reference in the Bill or whether the Government have given consideration to the possible hazardous mix between chemical and atomic materials. Will anyone ensure that a vehicle carrying a heavy load of toxic waste is not travelling at the same time as a vehicle carrying atomic waste from the power station? If they were nowhere near each other, there would be no danger whatsoever, but who will co-ordinate the transport? To the best of my knowledge, no one will do that.

The Government have not thought about co-ordinating traffic movements. They seem to be living in never-never land. They believe that once one has written "fragile" on a label, the parcel will never be thrown around. If that is the case, the Government can never have used the Royal Mail. The same applies to lorries. They may carry markings, but will people always respect them? They will not. That is not the way that people drive vehicles.

Why is not hazardous material given a police escort when it is transported? If it is so dangerous, why does the Bill not provide for it to have a police escort while it is being transported along our streets through the quiet of the night and at all other times? Legislation provides that a vehicle carrying a long steel girder or an old boat must have a police outrider, back and front. There is even legislation which provides that if one wants to carry a ladder over the end of a lorry a bit of rag must be tied round the end of it. Provided, however, the lorry is all right and the packaging is all right, nuclear material can be transported, and all is well.

I wonder whether the chief constable of Cleveland will ever be informed, or his traffic superintendent? I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston will be informed when nuclear material is transported on trains going through Lincolnshire? I wonder whether anyone will be aware that hazardous material is being transported? We hear that there are 300,000 such journeys each year. Boy, that is going to tie up a bit of police time! How many inspectors will there have to be to ensure that anyone who is concerned with the transport of this dangerous material has got it right?

I have asked a large number of questions relevant to the Bill and I have done so legitimately. I do not believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington can answer them. He is not a Government Minister and this is a Government Bill. Now I see that there is a Government Whip on the Treasury Bench. It must have been thought that this legislation would go through on the nod, that no one would be particularly interested in the movement of atomic waste. They must have thought that a little Bill of this nature, a private Member's Bill, would slip through. Well, slip through it might; but if it means that in future it will provide a legitimate excuse for those who might have an accident to say that they had done everything within the law, as laid down by Parliament, and that they did not have to inform the police, or to ensure that there were regular checks of the vehicle or regular driving tests for the drivers, it is perhaps just as well that a Back Bencher like me should have got up, kicked the Government in the backside and told them that they ought to have done their job properly. I do not believe that they have done their job properly.

I believe that the Government have misled my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington. He is an honest, decent guy. He introduced the Bill thinking that the Government were behind him, as I did when I introduced the Tees and Hartlepool Port Authority Bill. I honestly, genuinely and sincerely thought that the Government would support me. As I had the Prime Minister voting for the Bill in the Division Lobby, I felt secure in the knowledge that that Bill would reach the statute book. It did not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has now strayed into discussing another Bill. He must talk about this one.

Mr. Holt: With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, one tries to compare Bills to show that all Bills are not the same, that they are different and that consequently they should be treated differently. I am just trying to point out to my hon. Friend that the Bill that we are considering seems to have the same pedigree as mine and that its fate is likely to be the same as mine, but for different reasons. My Bill was not inadequate. There was no reason why it should not have been passed. The House of Commons wanted it to go through and voted for it, just as it voted for my hon. Friend's Bill. No hon. Member put forward legitimate arguments against the Tees and Hartlepool Port Authority Bill. It was left to a House of Lords Committee to sink it, without right of appeal. Its failure was more peremptory than what happened under Stalin in Russia.

There have been occasions when I have wanted to speak but have been unable to do so. Today I did not really want to speak, but I was persuaded to do so.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): We know why: the hon. Gentleman will be named.

Mr. Holt: I know that some hon. Members have just arrived; perhaps they could not get up this morning. Having arrived, perhaps they would have the courtesy to keep quiet while another hon. Member is on his feet. If, however, the hon. Gentleman wants me to give way, I shall happily give way to him if he has anything to contribute to the debate on the transportation of nuclear hazardous waste. One of the hallmarks of the debate has been the lack of contribution, interest and knowledge on the part of the Opposition. To try to be rude during an hon. Member's speech does not add to the quality of the debate, but it highlights the deficiencies in the thinking of the hon. Member for Worsley (Mr. Lewis). I do not believe that that enhances Parliament's role one little bit. Up to now we have enjoyed a reasonably good debate. The hon. Gentleman who has just come in has not heard the debate and does not know what it is all about, yet he feels that he can make a contribution to it.

Mr. Lewis: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that what I am talking about is the next debate on the Pig Husbandry Bill. We know what he is up to. I repeat what I said from a sedentary position—that he will be named.

Mr. Holt: If the hon. Gentleman had been here even for one minute before he made his intervention and had listened to any of the debate, he would have found it difficult to sustain his criticism. No one else has sought to criticise my contribution. I have been asked to explain a few points and I have given way on a number of occasions. I did so because we on this side of the House normally act with a degree of courtesy and decency. We do not behave in the way that so-called Front-Bench spokesmen for the Opposition do.

When I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, I did not hear one word about this Bill. Perhaps I ought not to have given way, but then you might have taken me to task, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for not giving way. However, the hon. Gentleman only wanted to talk about another Bill that is to follow this one. I am not aware of what he wants to talk about. If he wants to enlighten the House about his thinking, I am prepared to give way and allow him to tell us what it is about the road transportation of atomic waste and other atomic materials that is so vital and that has been missed out of the argument put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, or my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South. But now all that we are getting is a turning of the back and a chat with someone in the second row. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is getting instructions about what he ought to have said when he intervened a few moments ago.

It is not quite an hour since I rose to my feet, so I think that some hon. Members who are worried that the Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill may not see the light of day must have missed what I said earlier about my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton having spoken for 14 hours on a previous Bill. To be fair to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton, he covered the entire Bench with notes to make sure that he did not forget anything, and indeed he had many strong arguments. After only one hour, I may well be concluding my speech.

Mrs. Currie: I hope that my hon. Friend will not make a mistake about what happened. I was present when my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) made his speech. It was four hours, and not 14 hours, although it certainly felt like 14 hours. The main problem was that my hon. and learned Friend started speaking at about 4 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Holt: With great respect to my hon. Friend, I think that she will find that that speech lasted about 12 hours. I may have been exaggerating a little when I said that it was 14 hours. It did not start at 4 o'clock in the morning; it finished at 4 o'clock in the morning, having started at about 3.30 on the previous afternoon. I was in my usual place on that occasion, so I was sitting on the end of the Bench where my hon. and learned Friend had put his notes. I remember that my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South was sitting on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. These reminiscences are very interesting. I realise that the hon. Gentleman was led astray by the hon. Lady, but I am sure that he will now direct his speech to the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Holt: Would I allow my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South to lead me astray?

Mrs. Currie: Yes.

Mr. Holt: Of course I would, given half a chance. I hope that Hansard has not written down too much of that, or we shall both be in trouble when we go home!

I had intended to speak for only a few moments, but an hour is not very long to draw attention to important matters affecting the roads in my constituency and the lorries travelling along them. However, I have had to give way to unnecessary points of order from Opposition Members. Points of order are usually the only contributions we hear from Liberal Members, who have been completely absent today. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) wonders how I will vote on the Bill. I wonder how the Liberals will vote on it. They certainly have not made their position clear, but that does not surprise anyone.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I do not want to encourage my hon. Friend to continue because I am in favour of getting the Pig Husbandry Bill before the House because it is such an important measure. I accept his acknowledgement and I hope that he will do all he can to allow that Bill to come before the House.

Mr. Holt: I am not quite sure why my hon. Friend wants to steer me in that direction. My hon. Friend knows that my knowledge of Ealing is quite extensive, but I am not too sure whether there are any pig farms there. I wonder how many pig farmers my hon. Friend is representing today. If there are any in Ealing, perhaps he will let me know, because to the best of my knowledge there are none. My hon. Friend knows that I was born in the neighbouring constituency——

Mr. Ron Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you confirm that this is a Third Reading debate? While we recognise that the hon. Gentleman has the absolute right to speak at whatever length he chooses, whatever his motives, surely on Third Reading he has to be precise and his remarks must be addressed to the motion. I do not wish to challenge any of your earlier rulings, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but you have drawn the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that he has strayed wide of the mark. May I put it to you that, as this is a Third Reading debate, you have a responsibility to instruct the hon. Gentleman to bring his remarks to a close?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would be reluctant to do that at this stage, but I hope that when hon. Members make interventions they ensure that they are directly relevant. The hon. Gentleman who has the floor is finding it difficult to keep in order. If interventions tempt him out of order, it makes it that much more difficult for the Chair to protect the later business of the House.

Mr. Holt: I am not quite sure why the hon. Member for Caerphilly keeps interrupting while I am trying to wind up my speech. Every time I try to bring it to a conclusion somebody interrupts me.

As I am getting a little dry, I wonder whether I could pause for a drop of water. Hon. Members will know that I have permission to stop for a drink of water because of my medical condition.

On my way here I happened to be listening to the radio and I heard a gentleman talking about the society for plain English which is trying to get rid of gobbledegook. The Bill contains words and phrases which would lead the society for plain English to wonder what it meant. It refers to "70 kilobecquerels per kilogram". I thought that we were still the United Kingdon and I had not realised that we had become European to that extent. I do not remember when Parliament passed legislation saying that those who draft legislation were to do it in such a way that no one understood it, unless they were French.

I hope that in the absence of a Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington will tell those of us who are still English and who remember learning English weights and measures at school what "70 kilobecquerels per kilogram" means. Perhaps he can tell us how that information gets through to those who employ the lorry drivers and whether the lorry drivers will know whether they are within the law when they pick up their time sheets in the morning and go to the yard to collect their vehicles. Will they say, "Hang about, what does 70 kilobecquerels per kilogram mean?" How will they measure that? I do not think the Government have thought that through. I do not think that my hon. Friend has thought it through, and nor did he expect me to ask that question. Before we give the Bill a Third Reading, can somebody tell me in plain English what is meant by "70 kilobecquerels per kilogram"? That is in the legislation we are being asked to pass and we are still the United Kingdom Parliament.

The Bill goes on to refer to "such lesser specific activity". I hope that the lorry drivers know what that is. I expect that they would probably be more inclined to want greater specific activity.

Who will pay and train all the examiners who will be examining the vehicles? Where is the money resolution for the money that Parliament will have to vote so that those people can be trained to carry out the examinations that will be necessary? I hope that my hon. Friend has an answer to that.

Mr. Fishburn: The money resolution has already been passed.

Mr. Holt: So the money resolution was passed before anyone knew how much it would cost. If local government tried to get away with that, Ministers and shadow Ministers would be leaping around screaming, but it appears that the Government can behave in that way without anyone getting upset.

One aspect of the Bill gives me cause for concern in my capacity as a member of the Select Committee on the Environment. The Bill refers to devices for cooling. One might have thought that the Bill would specify whether CFC coolants are to be used—or, indeed, contain an instruction that they should not be used. We now know that the release of CFCs into the atmosphere is the major cause of the ozone problem and global warming. To the best of my knowledge, however, we have not yet been able to find a commercially viable alternative to CFCs for use as coolants in vehicles and elsewhere.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): This is disgraceful.

Mr. Holt: Does the shadow deputy Chief Whip wish to intervene? I am more than willing to give way.

Mr. Dixon: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman's speech is an abuse. He is not making a Third Reading speech and he should have been brought to order on numerous occasions. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have allowed him to digress in response to interventions from hon. Members who wish to talk out the next Bill. I ask you now to bring the hon. Gentleman to order and to tell him to make a Third Reading speech, as he should have been doing for some considerable time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will leave that matter to the Chair.

Mr. Holt: I do not impugn Opposition Member's motives, and it is wrong that they should seek to impugn the motives of Conservative Members. I have always found that bullies like things when they are going their way, but are always the first to complain when things do not go their way. Fortunately, I do not have much to do with bullies. Bullies do not frighten me—so do not try it here—and I know that bullies will not frighten you either, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If I stray out of order, you will give me that little haul on the reins—as you have already done several times—and I shall immediately return to order. I have been told that I am not making a Third Reading speech, but I have been asking legitimate questions and talking exclusively to the Bill. If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, feel that the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) has any meaning, so be it. We have known for a long time that members of the Labour party do not like honest decent debate, and on this occasion they have shown their hand even more than usual.

Before that rather rude interruption, I was talking about devices for cooling and CFCs. The Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington may or may not go through, and I sought to draw to his attention the fact that it is not good enough merely to refer to coolants. One must define what they are, especially as we are discussing the safe transportation of hazardous materials. That makes it incumbent on us to include a definition. New kinds of coolants may be used in future. The Bill seeks to put right the errors, wrongs and sins of legislation introduced in 1947. In 10 or 20 years the generic title "coolants" may include substances that may have a chemical input and may act as a catalyst in the event of a horrendous accident. We never know what accidents will entail until they happen. Almost all accidents are about people not being able to prepare themselves in time. If we glibly include the word "coolants" without defining it, in 10 or 20 years my successor—not the successor of my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, because my hon. Friend is still a young man—will say, "Why did they do that when they had the opportunity of the Third Reading debate to discuss it? Why did they include the generic term 'coolants' without specifying chemical values?" I should have welcomed an explanation from the Minister of why the Government favoured the inclusion of those words. I am not sure whether the Government would know entirely what they meant by "thermal insulation" either.

I have suggested that there are weaknesses, defects and problems relating to the Bill, even though it is a short Bill. Perhaps Opposition Members are so much in favour of atomic energy and the atomic industry that they want the Bill to go through without anyone debating it. I am sure that Labour activists throughout the country will ask why it was left to a Conservative to raise issues concerning nuclear power and public safety questions arising from the use and transportation of nuclear materials? Where are all those with CND badges? Where are all those who have opposed everything that has been done in respect of nuclear power for the past 50 years? Clearly they lack the staying power to come to the House on a Friday or the intellecutal power to understand the Bill. [Laughter.] Did I say something funny? Certainly there is a great lack.

I am pleased about one thing. My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston said that my speech had driven everyone out of the Chamber. That has proved to be false. There are four times as many hon. Members present now as were present when I rose to my feet a few moments ago. If I keep going for a few more hours—as I have suggested I just might—perhaps even more hon. Members will return to hear this debate on the important subject of radioactive materials.

Sir Richard Body: I merely drew attention to the fact that, with the exception of my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn), who introduced the Bill, all those concerned with it had left the Chamber. That is a remarkable achievement—especially as both Front-Bench spokesmen walked out. I do not think that that has ever happened before. It has certainly not happened in the 30 years that I have spent in the House. It is a remarkable achievement, and I congratulate my hon. Friend.

Mr. Holt: I had never expected such plaudits. In any case, it is not true. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) had walked out before I rose to speak. Only my hon. Friend the Minister, having heard a few words of my argument, realised that it was better to be somewhere else. Perhaps I should plead guilty in that respect. In response to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston, with his 30 years' standing, I would only say that I bet that some hon. Members who have left will wish that they had not. I bet that by the time that the matter has been analysed, some people will wish that they had not been here at all. They may well have come here today anticipating that we would reach the Young Persons (Alcohol Abuse) Etc. Bill, which is item 6 on the Order Paper. That was the Bill in which I was really interested. I expected that the sponsors of that Bill would be present. However, I do not think that we will reach item 6.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): I am a latecomer to the debate. Not only do I have an interest in the Pig Husbandry Bill, on which I hope to speak as several amendments have been tabled by me and other hon. Members, but I have a keen interest in the Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill. Throughout my time in the House of Commons I have been approached by constituents who were fearful about safety issues. They had good reason.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot debate again the Pig Husbandry Bill. It has been raised many times already this morning. On that subject, we are moving rapidly towards tedious repetition.

Mr. Holt: I hope that you do not accuse me of tedious repetition, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was not the first to refer to the Pig Husbandry Bill; it was the hon. Member for Jarrow. The second person was my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston, the third was my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington and the fourth was my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson). Indeed, Hansard will show that, far from being repetitious on the Pig Husbandry Bill, I have made little reference to it. I may have strayed gently on one occasion in response to promptings from the Opposition Front Bench. But I do not want to upset you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by talking about the Pig Husbandry Bill.

In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West, let me point out that I have a great deal to say on the Pig Husbandry Bill, which may exercise the House for a little longer than I am likely to exercise the House on the Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill.

I am glad to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) has arrived in the Chamber. We are discussing a Bill which affects Northern Ireland. That is unusual. We do not normally have legislation in one tranche.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): My hon. Friend refers to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea). Does my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) agree that it is exceptionally good to see my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Ulster in the Chamber today because Northern Ireland is specifically excluded from the Pig Husbandry Bill? He is having to wait a very long time to express his views on that important Bill.

Mr. Holt: I had not realised that the Pig Husbandry Bill did not apply to Northern Ireland. That highlights the nonsenses of the way in which we legislate in this establishment. A Bill about the transport of radioactive materal by road includes Northern Ireland, so that we do not need a separate piece of legislation, but the Pig Husbandry Bill does not extend to Northern Ireland. We shall need two or three pieces of legislation to cover the whole of the United Kingdom. How will the poor people of Northern Ireland suffer as a consequence of the House failing to do its duty? However, I shall not be tempted to go into that matter, despite my hon. Friend's intervention. It would be wrong of me to do so and I want to stick to the Bill before the House.

I notice that the Bill provides in clause 5(2):

"If a justice of the peace, on sworn information in writing or, in Scotland, on evidence of oath".

Scotland is mentioned in the Bill. I am sure that my hon. Friends wonder why the Bill mentions Scotland only on page 5 in clause 5(2). Why does it not mention Northern Ireland specifically? I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington wants his legislaiton to be fair to the United Kingdom as a whole. Why does not the Bill simply say, "a justice of the peace" or "a justice of the peace in England, Scotland, Northern Ireland or Wales"? Why have the parliamentary draftsmen brought Scotland into the Bill separately?

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Ulster for being here and to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) for pointing out that the Pig Husbandry Bill does not apply to Northern Ireland. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, who has a great fondness for Scotland, will want to explain why Scotland is mentioned but not Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland is just as much an integral part of the United Kingdom as anywhere else, although sometimes legislation may not apply to it.

It worries me that the southern Irish Government have no nuclear waste disposal facilities of their own. They haul any waste which they need to dispose of over the border into Northern Ireland and from there it goes on to the mainland.

Mr. Ron Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As there is no reference to Northern Ireland in the Bill, surely the hon. Gentleman is out of order in mentioning it in this Third Reading debate. I ask you again to insist that the hon. Gentleman bring his remarks to a close. He is clearly out of order, and he has been so for most of the one and a half hours during which he has spoken. I urge you to make sure that he complies with the rules of the House and brings his comments to a close.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the House will leave the matter to the Chair. I have listened carefully to the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt). I have stopped him on many occasions when he has been out of order. However, when he is discussing what is in the Bill, he is in order and the House must hear him.

Mrs. Currie: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that the Bill applies to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing out that the Bill mentions Northern Ireland. Therefore, I wonder why it highlights Scotland in clause 5(2). I am sure that the matter is no different in Scotland. I should have thought that it was the same. It seems that the Bill contains unnecessary wording.

It is perhaps not always obvious to members of the Opposition Front Bench that when one is debating it is not always possible to confine one's remarks entirely to the wording of the Bill. One must always draw from outside for comparisons. One could not examine the Bill in full if one did not do so. I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for your protection against the unwarranted attacks from the Opposition Front Bench. The Opposition seem obsessed with putting the Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill on the statute book. I would bet a few pennies to a pound that that is not in line with what the Labour party conference would want them to do. However, Opposition Members are not standing in front of their party conference, and nor will they be doing so for a while. [Interruption.] I am being barracked by my own side. That is the ultimate cruelty and irony.

Clause 6 deals with offences committed by a body corporate and penalties. I am not sure exactly who would carry the can. If the chairman of the Atomic Energy Authority or Nirex engaged the services of someone in Northern Ireland to transport nuclear waste and, for whatever reason, the vehicle failed to match up to the specifications, would the chairman be charged? Although I accept that ultimate responsibility lies in that direction, it stretches the point too far to suggest that the body corporate should carry the can for 300,000 movements by road per year. The fat-cat lawyers would get even fatter and cattier. There would be more and more legislation as more and more offences were committed, more and more people were taken to court and more and more defences were introduced. The Bill will be just like all the other legislation that we pass here—sometimes for the good of the people, but always for the good of lawyers. This legislation will be in that mould.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington can tell me whether it is a good idea for the chairman of Nirex to have to go to gaol for two years if somebody breaks this legislation. I wonder whether he has discussed the matter with the chairman and whether the chairman has agreed that it would be a good idea for him to have that responsibility. We all know how capricious juries can be, but it would be strange to find the chairman guilty.

I wonder how this Bill lines up with European legislation on the subject and similar national legislation about the transport of radioactive material by rail and air. Neither of those two measures is before us, so perhaps this legislation is a little premature. Perhaps the Government should have introduced a comprehensive Bill covering all transportation of such materials.

I am convinced that there are flaws in the Bill even now and I have highlighted some of them. I hope that when my hon. Friend replies he can give a full, thorough and lengthy response to my points. I want to support him and to be convinced. More important, my constituents want to be convinced that this simple, nine-clause Bill would be good for the country, for Parliament, for the nuclear industry, for the road transport industry and for them.

Other hon. Members must speak for their constituents, but I believe that my constituents will find certain aspects of the Bill incomprehensible, not least "70 kilobecquerels per kilogram". Perhaps they all understand that. They are such jolly nice people. I do not and I am sure that Opposition Front-Bench Members do not, because I have already given them three opportunities to intervene to put me right and tell me where my education went wrong.

I wonder whether my hon. Friend has thought through what the legislation means by "placarding of vehicles". What is the legal definition of "placarding"?

Sir Richard Body: I cannot hear.

Mr. Holt: I was just saying that I wondered whether my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, when he drafted the Bill—it is his Bill, not the Government's Bill, as we all know—looked up the thesaurus to find out the exact meaning of "placarding". I wonder what the legal definition is. Perhaps my hon. Friend, the lawyer at the back here, can tell me how many days in court he will spend and how many hundreds of pounds he will be able to make from defining what "placarding" is.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I should point out that I am not a lawyer but a chartered surveyor.

Mr. Holt: I realised that my hon. Friend was one of the wealthy fraternity, but I had not realised that he was in that special wealthy category. I apologise if I demeaned him by calling him a lawyer. I apologise to any lawyers who are present, too.

Perhaps, even as a chartered surveyor, my hon. Friend, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Holland and Boston, can tell me when they vote——

Sir Richard Body: I am only a poor pigman. I am not a lawyer.

Mr. Holt: Surely that is a contradiction in terms. I have never met a poor pigman, but I have met a few rich ones. I have met some, however, who were getting poorer and if certain legislation were passed some pigmen would certainly be much poorer.

Mr. Ron Davies: Order.

Mr. Holt: For a moment I thought that I was being called to order, but I realise that the voice came from the Opposition Front Bench.

Sir Richard Body: Is there any evidence of pigmen getting poorer? I have been unable to get any such information from friends and colleagues. Is that true?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The hon. Gentleman's questions do not relate to the Third Reading.

Mr. Holt: I was having some difficulty understanding where poorness and placarding came together. Presumably my hon. Friend the Member for Holland and Boston, who lives on the outskirts of London, has never been up to North Yorkshire. If he visited that area and met some of the genuine farmers he might find out about the problems that are liable to be experienced if a certain piece of legislation is passed. It would be out of order, however, to mention that now and my hon. Friend should stop tempting me to do so. If he does, I know that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will haul me back.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I believe that I have already hauled the hon. Gentleman back to the Third Reading.

Mr. Holt: Yes, I accept that, but I was just saying that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Boston with Holland who was out of order. I was merely trying to correct that by saying that I could not relate what my hon. Friend said about——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the House understands the situation. May we get back to the Third Reading?

Mr. Holt: I realise that you took the Chair a few moments ago, Madam Deputy Speaker, but if you had been here earlier you would have noted the great difficulties encountered by some Oppositions Members in trying to follow any of the argument. They are truly incapable of reading such a Bill. I have tried to spell out the Bill simply so that the three Labour party Members present will understand.

Before I was interrupted by my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston I was talking about placarding. It is clear that my hon. Friend does not want me to make progress so that we can move on to something else, or he would not keep on interrupting. The same goes for the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman.

What is the legal definition of placarding in accordance with the Bill? Is it the same as that in the thesaurus? What does it mean? Imagine how my constituents will react when they realise that they must implement the law as it is contained in the Bill. Haulage contractors will say that it is all very well for me to pass the Bill, but that they must tell their drivers what placarding means. Does anyone know? Does it mean that people will be stopped on the outskirts of Teesside on the A19 by a policeman because he is not sure whether those vehicles carry legal placarding?

We are supposed to be talking about the movement of radioactive material, which is a serious subject. I believe that the Government have tried to slip something through the House on this serious matter. The Opposition are incapable of properly opposing anything and they did not think about the Bill. They did not register the Bill and allowed it to go through without delay, as is clear when one considers the length of time the Bill took to complete its Committee stage—12 minutes. The Opposition's scrutiny of legislation of this nature amounted to 12 minutes. I wonder how they will explain that to all the Labour party executive committees up and down the country? As they have nearly all been reselected perhaps the official Opposition will be all right.

Mr. Ron Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Holt: If it is on this issue, I shall do so gladly.

Mr. Davies: It is clear what we would say to any Members of the Labour party who might questions our actions on the Bill. It is a private Member's Bill and it is not the practice of Her Majesty's Opposition to involve themselves, in a party political sense, in such private legislation.

Mr. Holt: I hope that I hear those words again the next time that we introduce a Bill on abortion. I recall that last time things were different when we discussed such a private Member's Bill on a Friday.

The hon. Member who has his hand over his mouth has tried to intervene four or five times. I am not sure whether he is trying to catch my eye or trying——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that if the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) were trying to catch the hon. Gentleman's eye, he would rise to show clearly that he wished to intervene.

Mr. Holt: I wish that that was so. I wish that the hon. Gentleman would rise, because he has now sat for some time making noises behind his hand. I wonder, Madam Deputy Speaker, whether you should ask the Serjeant at Arms to send for the nursing sister.

Mr. Ron Davies: Is is worth putting it on record that the hon. Member involved is the Opposition Deputy Chief Whip. We were discussing the hon. Gentleman's proposition. The hon. Gentleman suggested that, on matters of private legislation, the Labour party took a party line and he used the example of the abortion legislation which the House discussed recently. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the principle that I outlined applied to that legislation as well as to all other legislation. So that the record is clear, my hon. Friend and I went into different Lobbies when we voted on the previous legislation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Perhaps now that that matter has been cleared up the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) will make progress with his Third Reading speech.

Mr. Holt: I am sensitive to what you have said, Madam Deputy Speaker, because we are talking about radioactive material which can be volatile. The hon. Member for Caerphilly said that the official Opposition did not have a view, but that does not stop individual members of the Opposition holding views. Or do they all have to wait, like sheep and goats, until they are told what to do by their Front-Bench spokesmen? Are they allowed to speak or to intervene only on days when they have been told what to speak on? I thought that at least some members of the Labour party were concerned about radioactive material, its use, its transportation and its dangers and about this legislation. However, their absence today and their lack of contribution in Committee shows that despite the many years of posturing by the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, the Opposition and others, they are not, at the end of the day, especially interested. If they were, they would have been here and would be supporting me in force. It would not have been a short debate of a few hours —it could have continued for days. But the Opposition are not here in force because they are not interested in radioactive material or in the Third Reading.

Until I was interrupted, I was talking about the regulation on placarding of vehicles. I have received no information fom either my hon. Friend who sponsored the Bill on behalf of the Government or from the stand-in Minister—who is here in place of the Minister who should be here—about what placarding means. If, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food said from a sedentary position, it means a cardboard cut-out, I wonder what type of cardboard cut-out—of a policeman, of a co-driver or of a fireman? The legislation does not tell us.

Unfortunately, as you are aware, Madam Deputy Speaker, the Minister had to depart and now I see that the sponsor of the Bill has also had to leave. Who will answer at the end of our short debate? Not only hon. Members, but especially people outside the House want to know what is meant. The Bill refers to "the preparation, labelling, consignment, handling, transport, storage . . .and . . .placarding of vehicles."

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington has returned. When he makes his winding-up speech, he will no doubt give me a clear explanation about what he meant by "placarding". I want to know why he included the word in the Bill because it seems to be an unnecessary piece of verbiage. I cannot recall any other road transport legislation for radioactive material. Perhaps the word comes from the Radioactive Substances Act 1948 which the Bill seeks to amend. Placarding may have been in vogue in 1948, but today it is no longer so.

Sir Richard Body: Has my hon. Friend picked up a piece of paper containing notes for his speech which he discarded some time ago? I thought that we had already heard about placarding once. Will my hon. Friend pick up another piece of paper and give us a fresh point about the Bill?

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I have no pieces of paper; all that I have is the Bill. I have drawn everything from the Bill. If I did not, you Madam Deputy Speaker, would pull me up and say that I was out of order. I have stuck religiously to the Bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is tempting me.

Sir Richard Body: I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh will refresh his memory. My memory tells me that we heard all about placarding about 45 minutes ago. Shall we have in the next 45 minutes a repetition of all that we heard in the previous 45 minutes? It was all very good the first time round, but the second time round, it may lose its force.

Judges used to say to young barristers that good points do not need too much repetition. If my hon. Friend's point is good, we can take it in and leave it at that. However, if it is made two or three times, it will not be as effective.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that lesson in debating. My school was probably not quite as grand. At my school, I was told that if one had a point, one should make it, make it and make it, so that people would eventually understand it. If one makes the point only once and then wanders off esoterically into something else——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, our procedures in the House do not allow such repetition. I know that in the course of his speech the hon. Gentleman has repeated himself on a number of occasions. I do not want to call him to order just yet, but I must point out that he is trying the patience of the House. Unless he can now be more pertinent in this Third Reading debate, I am afraid that I may have to use the powers given to me by the House.

Mr. Holt: That is quite a threat. To some extent, it is a threat to free speech. Unless I strayed way out of order, I should find it difficult to accept a ruling from the Chair which forced me to sit down. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] The loud-mouthed yobboes and bullies of the Opposition may be trying to bully you, Madam Deputy Speaker, but they certainly will not bully me.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Do not hold your breath on that one.

Mr. Holt: For about an hour, Opposition Members have been trying to coerce, bully and silence me because that is the way in which the Labour party reacts. If Labour Members do not like an argument, and if it is too strong and salient for them——

Mr. Dixon: It is beginning to smell.

Mr. Holt: Labour Members do not seek to out-debate or to use an intellectual argument [Interruption.] They use the yobbo tendency and shout and scream, as they are now. I do not want to go down the yah-boo tendency route of the Labour party. We are not here to do that. We are here to debate the Bill and I was looking forward to a contribution from any Labour Member explaining, among other things, how the Labour party intends to square its view on the Bill with its supporters throughout the country——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Member that that is not the point in question on the Third Reading. I am sure that he will now oblige me by debating what is in the Bill.

Mr. Holt: It is clear from the Bill that vehicles will travel on roads carrying radioactive material. Those vehicles will go through areas which are claimed to be nuclear-free zones. Those areas have been designated nuclear free by the Labour party. As the Labour Front-Bench spokesman on the subject is not in his place, I had hoped that a Labour Member would explain how the Opposition square this legislation with the nuclear-free zone concept and how they will vote on the issue at the end of the debate. After all, Labour Members will have to square their view on this with their supporters in my constituency and in Cleveland as a whole, where we have a nuclear power station and a nuclear-free zone.

Do Labour Members believe that certain roads should be proscribed while others should be allowed for such vehicles? The fact that the Bill would permit the transportation of radioactive material on any road anywhere is a weakness. I had hoped that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, or preferably the Minister, would explain how the Bill would be amended to ensure that its defects were put right. I am surprised that the Labour party has not made its views on that clear.

The transportation of radioactive material is not something for kiddies on Saturday afternoons. We are discussing serious business. If this material is to be transported properly, it must travel in good vehicles on good roads. The Bill does not stipulate what types of roads will be used and whether some roads, such as narrow country lanes, will be banned.

[Mr. Holt]

Generally speaking, drivers take the shortest and quickest route, which may not be the most convenient and safest. If safety is paramount and is what this exercise is all about, drivers should be told the routes that may be used. The police and emergency services should know those routes, after they have been approved by fire and police chiefs. In other words, when speaking of the vehicles, we should also consider the roads on which they will travel, or the legislation will be defective.

Many of us have a problem that is commonly faced in Parliament with measures such as this. I approve of what is in the Bill and have no desire to stop its progress. The trouble is that it does not go far enough and it is weak and defective in certain areas. Those weaknesses allow for dangers which need our attention. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington will say that he is aware of those weaknesses and is anxious for them to be corrected. I had hoped that a Minister would confirm that and say that further legislation would be introduced to make up for the deficiencies, including transportation by rail, sea, air and canals.

I fear that the Bill will lead people into believing that they live in a fool's paradise. It will be like the nuclear-free zone sign. People believe that once they have passed the sign, they are safe. That is the biggest piece of hogwash of all time. People may equally believe that once the Bill is passed, they are safe. It could be misleading and give people a false sense of security. I want the Bill to be passed, but I want a promise that there will be further legislation. I want someone to tell me that the fears that I have expressed are well founded. If they are not, I want someone to tell me that I have got it wrong. With respect, I do not think that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, although he is the Bill's sponsor, is in a position to do that because he was not given a sufficiently good brief by the Government.

I do not suppose that those questions have been asked, probed or looked into. If they have, the Minister responsible should have been here to answer them. It is all very well to say that we came along with a nice piece of legislation, the Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill, full stop, and we can now go home because it will be dead safe on the roads and the Bill ensures that the packaging is right. It might be, but as yet we have had no answers about whether the driver will be tested or the roads proscribed.

However, we are told that there will be inspectors and examiners, who will be trained using public money. We have already been told that that money has been allocated. But to what end will those officials inspect and examine and what will they be inspecting and examining—the packaging, the vehicles or, more particularly, the humans who are to drive the vehicles? Without that knowledge, there is something missing. That does not mean that the Bill is wrong—it is not. It is a good Bill, but it is weak and needs attention. It cannot and should not be allowed to rest as it stands. I shall not vote against it or urge my colleagues to do so. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington intends to call a Division at the end of the debate—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend is shaking his head to show that he has changed his mind. Has my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) been at him again?

Mr. John Townend: I just want to debate pigs now.

Mr. Holt: I have been speaking for not quite two hours, which is not very long.

The Bill intends to put right errors and omissions in the legislation passed in 1947. On that basis, it could be more than 34 years before there is further legislation, although I hope that it will not be that long before a Minister answers the questions that I have posed or before we have further legislation to cover some of my worries.

Despite the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston may tell me off for repeating myself, we should know what placard to use and what the Government's intentions are in relation to testing the humans involved. We need a definition for roads—are roads and lanes the same thing? Will the vehicles be allowed to go down lanes? None of those issues is properly explained and there are many weaknesses.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington has done well in getting the Bill this far. I know the frustration of proceeding with a private Bill, only to have it rejected. I steered mine through fives votes in the House and lost it on only one vote in the Lords. It was lost on a technicality; their Lordships said that my private Bill was premature because a Government Bill was coming along behind it. The Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill is a hybrid of a Government Bill proposed via the private Members' route. It would be good if a proper Government Bill were introduced by a Minister so that legitimate questions and fears could be assuaged. But as things stand now, that is not what we have. It is almost an introductory Bill. It is as though the Government said, "There is something wrong, and has been for 30 years, and we must put it right with an introductory Bill. If anyone says anything about it, we shall simply say that it is being introduced through the private Members' route." That is not the right way to do it.

I apologise if I have spoken for a little time, but I thought it necessary to point out to the Government and others that this place is not to be taken for granted. It is a serious debating Chamber and serious issues must be treated seriously. However much levity one might introduce into one's speech, there is always a serious message. My message is that for the people of Cleveland, the Bill has not gone far enough. The Government should get their act together and introduce a proper Bill dealing with the whole area of the transportation of radioactive material. Whether or not people like it, it will be a major issue in coming years. More and more radioactive material will be used to create power and for medical purposes.

In 1947, people could no more envisage what would happen today than we can envisage what will happen in 34 years' time. The problem is that once we pass legislation, it lies for ever in front of us. Every now and then, somebody refers to an Act in 1612 or 1802 or whatever. We could be equally guilty of passing legislation that could fall into that category. I do not think that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, would wish to preside over that. I do not think that my hon. Friends who have spoken in the debate would wish to be parties to that. Of course, I do not know that the Minister feels.

I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington that it was a good try and if there is a vote I shall support Third Reading. However, the Bill has deficiencies and I have enjoyed having the opportunity to highlight them. I thank my hon. Friend and the House for their patience.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Pig Husbandry Bill

Order for consideration, as amended, read.

1.2 pm

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): I beg to move, That the order for consideration of the Bill be discharged and the Bill be withdrawn.

I owe you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and the House an explanation for this action. I also owe it to the many thousands of people who have supported the Bill, not least the pig farmers who have campaigned for a long time for changes in the law because of the disrepute into which certain types of pig farmers have brought that sector of the industry.

This week, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food published regulations on pig husbandry.

During the past day or so, I have had the opportunity to read the draft, and I could find no differences of any consequence between those regulations and my Bill. Indeed, the regulations are largely the same as my Bill, almost word for word, in all its important parts. I congratulate and thank my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary for what they have done—it is quite notable.

My right hon. Friend's action has put this country ahead of the remainder of the European Community. So often, we hear that Britain is lagging behind, and are told that we must wait for the men in Brussels to take the initiative while we drag our feet. In this instance, we are doing the opposite, and I wholeheartedly congratulate the Government.

There is no doubt that the majority of pig farmers entirely support what the Government are doing in these regulations. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has given ample time for consultation. Views have been expressed, and I am delighted that the Minister has paid good heed to the representations that have been made.

Moreover, I heard this week from DG6—only some of us know about that—which is a powerful body of people in Brussels, the department of the Commission which is concerned, among other things, with animal welfare.

Dr. Jansen, who is, I understand the chief veterinary officer of the Commission in Brussels has welcomed the regulations wholeheartedly and has said that if they go through, the European Commission will go ahead and approve draft regulations that will extend throughout the Community. That means that this country will have set the pace in animal welfare and it will probably be the first time that we have done so or that the Community has done anything about animal welfare.

Also, the Commission proposes to produce quickly draft regulations that are in line with the Welfare of Animals at Slaughter Bill, which has already passed through this House and which I introduced earlier in this Session. That Bill will soon be before the other place.

In matters of animal welfare, we shall certainly be ahead of the Community in two respects, and that is something worth recording.

In a letter that is coming to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, Dr. Jansen has said that as soon as the regulations are enforced, his position will be strengthened and he will be able to put forward draft regulations. Let us hope that the Community will then follow our example. There is no reason why it should not.

Dr. Jansen and officials in the Commission take that view because there was a full conference in Brussels on the subject late last year. They reached the conclusion that there was no necessity for the practice of sow stalls and tethers, which have existed in this country for about 28 years. The practice originally came from Sweden and certain other countries are beginning to introduce it, but only on a limited scale. Therefore, the Commission hopes that the draft regulations will put a stop to any further introduction, in any part of the Community, of the close confinement of sows.

I had hoped that we would have some time for debate on the Bill because there are important issues to be discussed, but I recognise that certain hon. Members have made it perfectly plain that they did not wish it to be debated.

I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) here because she has expressed her views on animal welfare on other occasions, and they are not unknown to a number of people. From what I have heard from farmers in the midlands, they do not altogether share her views.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), with his usual gusto and good humour, has done his bit for those of his constituents who now have huge herds of 1,000 sows and sometimes more.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I am not sure how my hon. Friend knows what my views are on animal welfare. In the eight years I have been in the House, I have never spoken on the subject.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): It must be the only one!

Mrs. Currie: As for the views on animal welfare held by farmers in the midlands, if there is an opportunity this morning I intend to express the views of farmers in my constituency on the animal welfare issues that are raised in the Bill.

Sir Richard Body: I am sure that my hon. Friend is not inclined to entice me to repeat what has been said by a number of people who have overheard her comments. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Her views on the subject are known.

Mrs. Currie: They cannot be.

Sir Richard Body: My hon. Friend can huff and puff, if she wishes——

Mr. Sedgemore: She is a whinger.

Sir Richard Body: —but her views on the subject are known.

Mrs. Currie: They are not.

Sir Richard Body: It is true, as my hon. Friend said, that she has not expressed her views in the House—I agree about that—but she has expressed them right enough.

Mrs. Currie: I have not.

Mr. Sedgemore: Dick knows.

Sir Richard Body: She has expressed them, but I do not intend to repeat them.

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend does not know what they are.

Sir Richard Body: Indeed I do.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. There is a motion before us for debate. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will keep to it. Then we shall have fewer interventions from a sedentary position from all parts of the House.

Sir Richard Body: I could invite the House to take a tour around my constituency and consider all the road schemes that may or may not be pushed through. We listened to all that for about an hour, but I shall not do that. I intend to stick to the point, but it ought to be recorded that a few hon. Members tried to prevent any debate on the Bill. I had hoped that we might debate it.

I am not concerned about the Bill going through; as I have already said, the regulations are on the way and will be approved. We shall then have all that the Bill would have done, not only in this country but throughout the European Community, for the reasons that I have just given. The battle has been won. However, I had hoped that we might have a reasonably short debate on two points, the first being the European issue with which I have dealt. The European Commission is anxious to proceed along the lines of the Bill. I had also hoped that there might be an opportunity to rebut spurious scientific evidence about the 35-day period. I suspect that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington would have quoted a few scientists. I had hoped to have the opportunity to show that that evidence is mistaken and that for every scientist that my hon. Friend could produce, there are many others who would say exactly the opposite.

Pig farmers overwhelmingly take a different view from that upheld by the small band of scientists who support the close confinement of sows throughout virtually the whole of their lives. I had hoped that it would be possible to explain that neither the Bill nor the regulations need prohibit the segregation of sows. All that the Bill and the regulations do is to prevent them from being so segregated and confined that they cannot move around.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that many of us are here today to support the Bill that he saw through its Committee stage and that we are deeply disappointed that two hon. Members have sabotaged the Bill? Such a procedure is perfectly within the Standing Orders of the House. Nevertheless, it is deeply regrettable, as the Bill received its Second Reading after a clear majority of 118 hon. Members had voted for closure.

Sir Richard Body: Three hon. Members were involved and one or two others were going to come along later to help to sabotage it. However, it was a futile exercise because we shall achieve the aims of the Bill. Unfortunately, those aims will not be achieved in an Act of Parliament, and will not be debated in detail, as we had hoped. Had hon. Members raised scientific and practical points, their concerns could have been met.

The great majority of pig farmers who do not have 1,000-sow herds are in favour of the Bill and of cleaning up pig farming.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): My hon. Friend really does not know east riding where there are pig farms of all sizes. I have not had one letter from a pig farmer opposing my stand on the Bill. I have had 100 per cent. support in opposing the Bill. I challenge my hon. Friend to come to east Yorkshire and address a meeting of my pig farmers. He will find out that he is wrong and that he does not have the support of pig farmers. Some of them are in the Strangers' Gallery. He is misleading the House. I am sorry that he is withdrawing his Bill without hearing the debate because we have the facts——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Did I understand the hon. Gentleman to say that the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) was misleading the House? If that is the case, will he now withdraw that remark?

Mr. Townend: I apologise. I will rephrase that remark. My hon. Friend made an incorrect statement when he said that the majority of pig farmers supported the Bill. I challenge him to have a referendum with the pig farmers on that. I have a file full of letters which all——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us keep the debate in good order. The hon. Gentleman asked for an intervention. I shall try to call him later, but if he has finished his intervention I would be obliged if he would allow the hon. Gentleman responsible for the Bill to speak.

Sir Richard Body: I might be out of order if I remind the House that the only reason why I was selected by my constituency some 25 years ago was that I spoke with authority about pigs. The only reason why I chose to speak about pigs at my selection conference was that it was the one subject that I knew a bit about and I thought that I could stand up for myself on that issue.

My hon. Friend might be right about meadow units. I accept that, but they are not representative of farming or the great majority of pig farmers. I have been in the pig business for a long time and I have been to east riding four or five times to speak to audiences of pig farmers. I must say that on the last occasion I went there, they did not seem much like the majority of pig farmers elsewhere. They all arrived in Mercedes and other large cars. They did not seem to know much about pigs, but they knew all about computers and management. Some years ago a farmer in my constituency gave up pig farming. I asked him what he was going to do next and he said that he planned to concentrate on vegetables, mainly cauliflowers. I said, "That will be a tremendous difference", and he said, "No, it is all marketing. The same principles of marketing apply to pigs as to cauliflowers." That constituent had the same attitude to animal welfare as some of the farmers in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, whatever the attitude of the pig farmers of east riding towards his Bill, the public will not stand for those practices any longer? The public buy the pork that comes from the pig farmers of east riding and elsewhere and they are the principal impetus behind the worthy Bill that the hon. Gentleman is promoting.

Sir Richard Body: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly right, but it goes a bit further than that. The House has been discussing the matter for a long time. As long ago as 1981, the Select Committee on Agriculture spent a long time hearing all the arguments before producing a report that was against the use of sow stalls and tethering except under certain conditions—the kind of conditions embodied in the Bill and draft regulations. When the House supported the report in 1982, there was not a dissenting voice.

Ten years ago, there were no 1,000-sow units. Huge factory farms did not exist. They were about to appear and we thought that we should jump on them then. Unfortunately, however, we did not, and the result is that we now have some units with 3,000 sows. One man who telephoned me at the weekend has 10,000 sows on a huge mega-farm—if one can call them farms. That is almost unbelievable. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), but it is not only public opinion that is against the practice; the House condemned the system through its Select Committee and in a debate on the subject as long ago as 1982.

We are making progress. We are virtually there. The regulations are on the way and, as I said, the Commission has given the assurance that it, too, will be taking action. The House can be pleased with what has been achieved. It would seem that three hon. Members—perhaps one or two more—wish to sabotage our attempts. I am afraid that, in future, they will find that rather more difficult because of the Community. I am no supporter of the way in which the Common Market operates, but we must face the fact that, in future, many of our laws will be made not by this House but in Brussels. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Yes; the legislation on this subject and on slaughterhouses will be made elsewhere. My hon. Friend the Minister will be able to say that this country is leading in Europe. We are ahead of the other countries, and they are following. That is an achievement, and I congratulate my hon. Friend on what he has done.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): In supporting the motion, I wish first to express my great sadness that the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) has been forced to move it. This is a sad day because the House is sending a signal to the country and to the European Community that the British Parliament will allow itself to be sabotaged—in the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer)—and will allow vested financial interests to stand in the way of minor improvements in animal welfare.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Holland with Boston. I fully acknowledge the support that he has received from the Minister for the principle of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman and the Minister are two honourable exceptions in the present-day Tory party. We have seen this morning that the Tory party is prepared to sacrifice minimal improvements in animal welfare for very marginal economic benefits. I recognise that other Conservative Members who have sponsored or supported the Bill are also exceptions, but we have seen the true face of the modern Tory party in the tactics that we witnessed this morning. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt)——

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): The bookie's runner.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend refers to the hon. Gentleman as a bookie's runner. I would not put a bet on with the hon. Gentleman and I certainly would not fancy him running. His tactics this morning showed neither courage nor integrity. He abused the procedures of the House. He did not wish to challenge the Bill that would now have been before us, choosing instead to subvert the procedures of the House to prevent the House from discussing and deciding on the matter. His actions were both undemocratic and anti-democratic. He would have done himself more service if he had been prepared to oppose the measure openly and frankly.

The debate and the Bill deal with a cause that has inspired millions of people. By his actions this morning, the hon. Member for Langbaurgh has brought disrepute to himself, the House of Commons and the Tory party. He was not alone. He was aided by those waiting in the wings. he was preceded by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), who spoke for 18 minutes, and the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), who spoke for 27 minutes. The hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) was waiting in the wings, as was the hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). They are all signatories to the amendments.

Miss Emma Nicholson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I will give way to the hon. Lady, because I have named her. However, first I wish to finish my specific point.

The amendments were not designed to improve the Bill or to allow us to debate its benefits or economic consequences. They were tabled for the express purpose of allowing those hon. Members to kill the Bill this morning.

Mrs. Currie: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman said that I signed the amendments to the Pig Husbandry Bill. He is wrong and I ask him to withdraw that.

Mr. Davies: The record will show clearly that I accused the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South of speaking for 18 minutes. When I referred to the amendments, I specifically referred to the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West and the hon. Member——

Miss Emma Nicholson: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I ask the Chair to confirm that I did not have my name down to speak in the previous debate, that my name was not involved in any amendment and that it is a figment of Opposition Members' imagination that I was waiting in the wings to speak in the previous debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Let us cool the debate. These are matters for debate and I hope to call the hon. Lady shortly.

Mr. Davies: I do not wish to cool the debate. I am particularly angry this morning because I have seen the practices——

Miss Emma Nicholson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I shall answer the point that the hon. Lady raised in a moment.

Miss Emma Nicholson: Is the hon. Gentleman going to give way?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member at the Dispatch Box said a moment ago that he was willing to give way in his own time. I am sure that he will do so.

Mr. Davies: Of course, I will. Faced with a lady who wishes to intervene and a lady in the Chair, I have no option but to give way. The charge against the hon. Lady is that she is a signatory to the amendment tabled for debate this morning. I refer her to the amendments——

Miss Emma Nicholson rose——

Mr. Davies: The hon. Lady must restrain herself. She was not present while we listened for two hours to the most tedious speech from her hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh, who is a partner in her crime. I, who have been listening for two hours, take it amiss that she has been in the Chamber for only five minutes and wishes immediately to intervene. She is a party to the crime of this morning's hijack of the proceedings. She wants her hon. Friends to be allowed to give it, so she must take it for a moment.

Mr. John Townend: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: No, the hon. Gentleman should sit down. My point is that the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West is a signatory to the amendments——

Miss Emma Nicholson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: For goodness sake, for the fourth time——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must restrain herself. The hon. Gentleman at the Dispatch Box said that he would give way when he had finished his point. Will she please restrain herself until he gives way to her?

Mr. Davies: My point is that the amendments were tabled for the express purpose of killing the Bill. The hon. Lady is a signatory to the amendments. If she wishes to justify that, or withdraw her name from the amendments, I willingly give way to her.

Miss Emma Nicholson: The hon. Gentleman is withdrawing from his earlier statement, when he said that I was a partner in crime and was waiting in the wings to speak in the earlier debate. Does he agree that that was incorrect? My name was not down to speak in the earlier debate. I came here to speak on the Pig Husbandry Bill. The hon. Gentleman is taking my name in vain. Indeed, he is turning out to be a classic Labour male chauvinist pig or, might I suggest, a real sorry bore.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Lady is perfectly entitled to her view. The record will show that my point is clear and that it was clear when I made it initially. We have had one debate already this morning. It was deliberately prolonged by the hon. Members whom I have named precisely to ensure that inadequate time remained for this debate.

Miss Emma Nicholson rose——

Mr. Davies: The hon. Lady must restrain herself. I know that she is getting excited, but she must——

Miss Emma Nicholson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: No. The hon. Lady must understand that when a Member is addressing the House he has a right to finish a sentence without these constant interruptions.

The hon. Lady is a party to this morning's attempt to kill the Bill. Her name is on the list of amendments. I am fully aware that she intended to come to the House to speak to the amendments to the Pig Husbandry Bill. All Labour Members know that the purpose of the amendments is to kill the Bill, as the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) made clear.

Mr. John Townend: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: No. I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman now. There will be further opportunities for him to speak.

Mr. Mullin: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davies: I shall give way to my hon. Friend because he was present for the Second Reading of the Bill. He has been in constant contact with the hon. Member for Holland with Boston and has shown himself to be supportive throughout all the proceedings of the Bill in this House, as have my hon. Friends the Members for Worsley (Mr. Lewis) and for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey). If any of them wishes me to give way to them, I shall certainly do so because I know that they are concerned about improvement in animal welfare standards.

Mr. Mullin: My constituents and I care strongly about this matter. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important that those responsible for this morning's sabotage and the vested interests that put them up to it do not derive any advantage from what happened? Indeed, on the contrary, does he agree that it is important that they derive a serious disadvantage and understand that their actions this morning will be to the detriment of the vested interests that they represent? I realise that my hon. Friend is about to say that a Labour Government will certainly support such a measure in the European Community and, if necessary, through legislation. Does he agree that when the issue returns to the House we should think in terms of reducing the phasing-out period from 10 to the original five years? That would signal to the vested interests that the more they carry on with this sabotage, the harder it will get for them.

Mr. Davies: That is a powerful argument and I shall return to it in a moment.

I pay full credit to the Minister who will introduce regulations which will give effect to the particular purposes of the Bill. I have told him privately and will now do so in public that we shall do all we can to facilitate the passage of that legislation.

The present difficulty arises because this is a private Member's Bill and it would be inappropriate for the party to arrange any whipping or attempt to make a party political response to the Bill. All my hon. Friends who have supported the measure have done so as private Members. It is noteworthy that when the closure was forced on Second Reading, every Labour Member who voted, supported the Bill. It is true that the Labour party is absolutely committed to not only this welfare measure but others. I give full credit also to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), who represents the Liberal Democrats, who share our objectives in this matter. It is true that thus far we have been acting as private Members and that when the matter is introduced as a Government measure, we shall give it our full support. Inasmuch as this private Member's Bill has been wrecked, I undertake that when we have a Labour Government, as I am confident we shall in the not-too-distant future, we shall review these measures.

The hon. Member for Langbaurgh spoke for two hours this morning, but he has not had the courtesy to remain for this debate. However, he achieved one thing this morning: an incoming Labour Government will review the regulations. The attempt to hijack and sabotage the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Holland with Boston may have been successful, but that action may rebound on those hon. Members responsible. They will not be allowed to profit from their infamy.

On Second Reading, the hon. Member for Holland with Boston had the support of many of my hon. Friends and his colleagues when he sought to move the closure. The Bill received an unopposed Second Reading. Those hon. Members who killed the Bill this morning did not have the courage, integrity or the troops to call a Division against the Second Reading. They let the Bill go in the knowledge that they would attempt to subvert the will of Parliament at a later stage.

The hon. Member for Holland with Boston had the full support of the Government. They wanted the Bill to be amended to bring it into line with their objectives. I am sure that the Minister will acknowledge that we had a constructive debate in Committee when we explored the relevant issues. A number of amendments were accepted with near-unanimity which took account of the representations made, the need for the Bill and the Government's reservations. There was unanimity about attaining those objectives.

We improved the Bill and it came back to the House for what we hoped would be a formal Report stage and Third Reading. Little did we know that those hon. Members to whom I have referred would set about their task of tabling wrecking amendments with the purpose of killing the Bill.

Those hon. Members have succeeded in killing the Bill and I suppose that that is a credit to their parliamentary tactics, but it is a discredit to them as members of the human race. They have done a personal disservice to the hon. Member for Holland with Boston, who is a respected member of their party because of his support for animal welfare. Although the hon. Gentleman is a man of integrity and commitment to the cause of animal welfare, it is clear that he does not have many friends in the present Tory party. Those hon. Members, by wrecking the Bill, have done a disservice to the cause of animal welfare as the British House of Commons has been shown incapable of accepting even a minor measure that would result in minor improvements in animal welfare.

How will such actions strengthen the arm of the Minister, committed as he is to argue for animal welfare in the European Community? The Minister may argue at the EC that Britain wants to enforce the highest standards and to improve animal welfare. How will he defend his case when those who do not want to adopt the supposedly traditional British standards of animal welfare turn to him and say, "Yes Minister, but what happened to the Pig Husbandry Bill?"

Where is the great British commitment to animal welfare when financial vested interests were used to hijack the British House of Commons.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am sure that most hon. Members will be disappointed that the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) has not succeeded. I must defend the integrity, however, of my parliamentary colleagues. The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) alleged that they are acting for vested interests, but I am sure that they are acting in what they believe to be the best interests of their constituents. I am quite sure that if they had an interest in such matters they would have declared it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is barely a point of order for me because I am sure that those hon. Members would, or will, declare their interests. I hope that they will have an opportunity to respond during the debate.

Mr. Davies: I am not suggesting for one moment that those hon. Members who killed the Bill will receive any personal gain from doing so. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) is wrong if he thinks that I made such an assertion. If I had done so I would have referred to the declaration of interests and I would have specified my charges. I have made no personal accusations, but vested interests have wrecked the Bill. Some of those vested interests represent the pig farmers whom the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West mentioned earlier and whom he considers with such disapproval. Those farmers might be the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Davies: I shall not give way again. The hon. Gentleman raised a phoney point of order and he should give me the courtesy of his attention when I reply to it. I suggested that they had deliberately inspired hon. Members to kill the Bill. They did so because they did not wish to be involved in the capital expenditure that would be necessary to bring about the improvements. They believed, wrongly, that they would suffer a small financial disadvantage if the Bill were passed. That is why the Bill has been killed and that is why I make the charge. The Bill is about improvements in welfare standards and it has been killed because it would marginally infringe on the financial interests of those who would be affected. That is my charge and I do not withdraw it. I am glad, Madam Deputy Speaker, that you ruled that my charge was valid. I believe that the hon. Members who have killed the Bill have done a disservice to their constituents by their actions and they have demeaned the House and themselves.

The Bill was a small but important measure. It would have brought about minor improvements in welfare and in dry stalls by preventing a practice that has been widely recognised as cruel, unnecessary and unacceptable. The Bill was important not merely because it would have prevented the practice of using stalls and tethers, but because it would have been a message that the House was prepared to legislate and to demonstrate a commitment to be at least a first step in matters of animal welfare. That is why the defeat of the Bill saddens me.

The Bill was not presented as the personal whim or crusade of one individual. It had the support of everyone who has studied the practice of sow husbandry.

Sir Richard Body indicated assent.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Member for Holland with Boston agrees. It was widely supported on Second Reading when hon. Member after hon. Member testified to the strength of public feeling. Hundreds of letters were written and more than 100 hon. Members took it on themselves to come to the Second Reading debate to commit themselves to the cause of the Bill. There was not only support from those of us who are public representatives, but specific and specialist support from others who had considered the Bill. The veterinary profession was almost united—the hon. Member for Holland with Boston will challenge me if I am wrong about that—in advocating the Bill. Academics who have studied husbandry have supported the Bill, as did the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Compassion in World Farming—whose Bill it was—and the Farm Animal Welfare Council, which was established to advise the Government on animal welfare and the European Commission. The Government support the principles behind the Bill even if they do not support the precise form in which it has been drafted.

Although the Bill has received broad support, it has been destroyed by the vested interests to which I referred, ostensibly to further economic interests. I believe that hon. Members who have spoken so far and who believe that they have served the financial cause of their pig-producing constituents have done them a disservice, not only for the reason given by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) but for another reason: I believe that the British pig industry will be disadvantaged because consumers will begin to show a preference. The hon. Member for Bridlington may mock, but I look forward to a proper system of food labelling so that our constituents, when they do their weekly shopping, will be able to express support through their purchasing power for non-intensive systems and for systems that rear animals in conditions which they consider acceptable. The hon. Members to whom I refer therefore, have done their constituents a disservice in the financial sense.

One benefit of the Bill has been a proper debate about the impact on sow and pig rearing of the stall and tether system. All the evidence from the academics and veterinarians who have studied the matter is that the alternative systems which the Bill would encourage are more efficient pig producers than the stall and tether system. The alternative systems give a greater opportunity for breeding at a marginally faster rate. There is a great deal of evidence to suggest that litter sizes and the growth of piglets are superior under the alternative systems.

Sir Richard Body: The hon. Gentleman mentioned academics and veterinarians. Does he agree that stockmen share their view? Just over a year ago, I took part in the launch of the National Herdspersons Society to try to raise the standard of stockmanship. Members of that organisation are wholly in favour of raising standards and of ending the sow stall system because it has driven out of farming so many good stockmen. They say that one cannot be a good pigman unless one likes pigs, any more than one cannot be a good shepherd unless one likes sheep. They say that one cannot support and condone the system of sow stalls on its present scale if one has any feeling for or wish to work with pigs. That view has been repeated many times by professional stockmen for many years. It was emphasised to the Select Committee on Agriculture in 1981. The prediction was made on behalf of the stockmen that good stockmen would get out of the pig industry if the sow stall system continued. We have had to learn that lesson.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman is correct in the matters to which he has drawn our attention, as he is in so many other matters relating to farming.

The express concern of the hon. Members who have killed the Bill was that Britain would be out of step with Europe and that British interests would be jeopardised. I do not believe that. There is now clear evidence—the Minister may wish to address the point—that the Commission would have accepted the standards in the Bill and that it would have ensured that the standards were adopted throughout Europe. The cause of animal welfare in Europe has been weakened by the decision this morning.

There is some consolation in our debate. At the end of the day, victory will go to the hon. Member for Holland with Boston. He has ensured that we have had a full debate, that the public are aware of the issues, that the public have had the opportunity to express their concern and that the wide range of specialist and scientific opinion to which I referred has been given the opportunity to present its case to the House. I am sure that the Minister will acknowledge that his hon. Friend has ensured that when the Minister tables the regulations, stalls and tethers will be phased out. Those of us of all parties who are prepared to argue the case for animal welfare will have to acknowledge our debt to the hon. Member for Holland with Boston. I pay full tribute to him.

I understand that the Government have put the regulations out to consultation in almost final form. I have not yet had a chance to look at the proposed regulations in detail, but I understand that they will give full effect, if in a different way, to the proposals in the Bill. I congratulate the Minister on that. The regulations will have our full support when they come before the House and we will do whatever is necessary to facilitate their passage through the House.

The hon. Members who have attempted to kill the Bill this morning will not be allowed to profit from what they have done. One of the earliest acts of an incoming Labour Government's Ministry of Food and Farming will be to review all farm welfare measures. We shall then look, as a matter of Government policy, at whether the regulations now being tabled should be continued.

1.50 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Maclean): I shall be brief to enable other hon. Members to take part in the discussion, and I hope that I can restore some of the harmony and consensus that existed on Second Reading and largely in Committee.

I regret that my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) has had to withdraw his Bill, and I understand why he has taken that step. There was a great deal of consensus in Committee. All the issues were widely explored, particularly the vexed question of when the end of the phasing out period should be. Amendments were proposed to bring the date forward and to bring it in line with the Government's position. It is remarkable that hon. Members on both sides with deeply held views on animal welfare concluded that the phase-out period which is now in my hon. Friend's Bill, and which will be the same in our regulations, was an appropriate time.

I thank the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) for his kind words and, at the outset, I wish to put on record firmly that the Government agree with the objectives of the Bill. As I said in Committee, we take, and will continue to take, the matter of pig welfare seriously. On every occasion I have spoken about the Bill I have said that the Government would rather the objectives of the Bill were achieved by way of regulations made under the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968. The House will be aware that the Bill, as amended in Committee, contains a number of tortuous formulae which are necessary only because we are working with primary legislation.

I also made it clear that we would have preferred our regulations in the first place, but, because the Bill was considerably amended in Committee, it would have had the support of the Government. We welcome it and could have lived with it. I would also have told the House today, had we dealt with the amendments, that the Government could not have accepted any of them as tabled and would have wished the Bill to have passed as it stood. But I shall not go into any of those details now. I suspect that we shall cover them when we debate the regulations, which will be laid and be dealt with under the affirmative resolution procedure.

As we have no Bill, we can have regulations instead, and I intend that that shall happen. Those regulations can be introduced quickly and relatively easily, and they will have exactly the same effect as the Bill. Officials in my Department are maintaining a draft version which mirrors the progress of the Bill. The latest version was issued for brief comment on Tuesday of this week, with a short period given for further comments to be made. We kept that measure ticking over because we believe that regulations could be better than the Bill.

We wanted a fall-back position in case this eventuality, as happened today, occurred. We gave a commitment that the Government intended to introduce regulations if the Bill fell. It now seems that the Bill will fall, so we intend to introduce the regulations.

I should give a slight warning. My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston quoted the support of the Commission. I understand that although the Commission has not put a block on the regulations, the deadline for notifying the EC has not yet expired. We have until 6 May, and it is possible that there will be objections to them. If the Commission is giving us the green light, that is excellent news. If we get the Commission fully on our side, while that is good news and will allow our regulations to proceed unhindered, it will not mean that all other EC countries will fall in line pdq.

We will have a tough fight on our hands to persuade other EC countries, with the full support of the Commission if we have it, that they should follow the British lead on animal welfare. I can assure the House that when our regulations are in place—if the House agrees to them—we shall press most strongly in Brussels and other EC countries for similar legislation to apply there so that we are not at a competitive disadvantage and animals in those other countries are not at a welfare disadvantage.

The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) said that the will of the House had been frustrated today. May I say on the Government's behalf that the will of the House will not be frustrated today. Many hon. Members agreed with the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston and the Government would agree with it if it were amended. The regulations, which we have put out for consultation, mirror that. I give a clear undertaking that we intend to proceed with those regulations and, barring any hiccup from the Commission or our parliamentary procedure, they could and should be law by the summer.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members will appreciate that there is little debating time left. I hope to call all hon. Members. If they apply common sense and speak briefly, I may be able to do so.

1.57 pm

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): I shall speak for the fewest possible moments because I know the keen interest of other hon. Members to ensure that their voices are heard.

I warmly welcome the Government's adoption of measures identical to those proposed in the Bill. I read carefully everything that was said on Second Reading, for which I was present, and in Committee. I supported the Bill and its principle on Second Reading. My views on it are on the record. I asked the sponsor no fewer than five times if I could be on the Committee so that I could make some other points. He was unable to hear me in that context, which is the sole reason why I put down my name to speak today. I was glad to put my name with those of other hon. Members in support of the amendments. They are important amendments which should have been heard in Committee, and if I had been fortunate enough to be a member of the Committee I would have spoken to them then.

I am a lifetime supporter of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The deputy chief veterinary officer of the RSPCA was, at my instigation, the only speaker at a meeting of the constituency farm council of Torridge and Devon, West more than a year ago when we discussed other aspects of intensive farming.

I proposed the Slaughter of Deer Bill which, I am sorry to say, was blocked by members of Her Majesty's Opposition. It was a private Member's Bill and I accept that it was not blocked by Front-Bench spokesmen; Members of both major Opposition parties blocked it, for which I am sorry. I have a track record of speaking on animal welfare matters in the House and have put forward my own Bill.

I am glad that the Minister spoke so strongly in favour of the principles and practice of the Bill. I am also glad that he will now have time to consider the points made in the amendments. We shall perhaps have another opportunity to discuss those points with him. I welcome that and look forward immensely to working with him.

1.58 pm

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I have no vested interest in the pig industry. I see that the "Oxford English Dictionary" defines someone with a vested interest as someone with a personal interest in the state of affairs with an expectation of gain.

I am sad that the Bill has been withdrawn. If my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) had not withdrawn it, we could have had a debate of an hour and a half and I would have had an opportunity to propose the amendments in my name. They were not wrecking amendments; I did not intend to wreck the Bill and I made an offer to my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston to withdraw my opposition if he would accept my amendment dealing with the 35 days issue. We proposed that amendment on the basis of welfare as well as economics. As other hon. Members wish to speak, I am sorry that I will not have the opportunity to make those points.

My other main amendment would have prevented the Bill from coming into operation until there was equivalent legislation in other Community countries. I was saddened to hear what my hon. Friend the Minister said. When my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston said that he wished to withdraw the Bill, I thought that there would be rejoicing in east Yorkshire tonight. The pig farmers realise that their livelihoods are at risk. I tell Labour Members that as a rural Member of Parliament, it is my job to represent my constituents—just as it is the job of mining or textile Members of Parliament to represent their constituents.

There has been a clear change of Government policy——

Sir Richard Body rose——

Mr. Townend: With respect, other hon. Members wish to speak and my hon. Friend has had a good crack today. I have been waiting all day to speak. I was prepared to speak for three hours and I would have talked out the Bill because it would undermine the British pig industry.

In March 1989, the former Minister said in a Ministry document:

"It is clear that any legislation should be on a Community-wide basis."

The major objection of the pig industry is that, when moving towards a single market, the Bill would not allow them to compete on a level playing field. The Government now intend to impose regulations that will make their position very difficult.

On Second Reading, the Minister accepted that the Bill would disadvantage British trade, so I do not foresee objections from other EEC countries. He also said that the Bill had to be enacted within five years, or we would be flooded with pigmeat produced under the system that we had banned. That is likely to happen at the end of eight years because the revenue differential will be the same.

The Minister also said that the new proposals would increase running costs because "they must have a higher quality of animal husbandry and better qualified pig men. The level of the additional costs will depend on the type of system used and the value of additional inputs."—[Official Report, 25 January 1991; Vol. 184, c. 617.]

We expect the Labour party not to back British industry, but we expect the Conservative party to defend British industry and British agriculture. The Minister says that he will attempt to obtain EC regulations. I do not think that there is a cat in hell's chance of that. Some 90 per cent. of pig breeding in Denmark is under the dry sow system, as is 80 per cent. in Holland and more than half in Belgium, France and Germany, and the system is expanding rapidly in Spain. In Holland, it would be practically impossible to move to loose houses because it does not have the straw.

European Governments back their farmers for political and national reasons. If we legislate as the Government suggest, our pig farmers will be at a disadvantage. Can the House imagine other Common Market countries introducing legislation to lessen the advantage to their farmers? Can the House imagine the French introducing legislation that would place further burdens on their farmers while giving our farmers an advantage? It is inconceivable.

I know that we are up against it, but we shall continue the battle. Whatever regulations the Government may introduce, if they are imposed on our industry and not on our competitors, we will oppose them. There has already been one example of that on veal calf crates. They have been abolished in Britain, so when the calves are born they go to Holland, where they are fattened in the very crates that are illegal in this country and the veal then comes back to Britain.

The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) said that British farmers had lost an opportunity. Does he really believe that if the Bill had been passed and the cost of our pigmeat increased, the ordinary punter in the supermarket would be prepared to pay a premium for British bacon over Danish bacon? Labour Members do not live in the real world. It is difficult enough to try to sell British bacon in competition against the long tradition, heavy marketing and high quality of Danish bacon and we have made a lot of progress. However, if one attempts to appeal to a niche market—to sell to the sort of people who will make that decision—one will condemn oneself to a small part—10 or 15 per cent.—of the market.

There is a deficiency of £6 billion a year on our food account—larger than that for cars. The Government are introducing an initiative to reduce that deficiency and to increase exports of food products and decrease imports. Considering our balance of payments problems in the past 18 months, we certainly need to do that.

How can one expect our food industry to increase exports if it cannot compete on a level basis? When my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston talks about pig farmers in my constituency, he does not know what he is talking about. They vary from the smallest to the largest pig farmers. We have the largest concentration of pigs, and we are the major producers of pork in the country.

The reason why British bacon has been gaining market share is the quality and price of the bacon produced by those farmers. My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston wants to go back 25 years to the old farmer in his muddy boots. He does not think that they should have desks or computers. Why have they come to meetings in nice cars? Because they are successful. One thing that the former Prime Minister did for this country was to show that we have to be successful if we are to survive. When I hear all this claptrap I think that it is a criticism of successful farmers who are able to produce more. For years the Government have been calling on farmers to produce more and to reduce imports. If they have been successful and have invested the money, they will have made profits. Therefore, they have a right to a good car, just as my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston has a good car out of his parliamentary allowance.

I am ashamed of what has been going on and of the way in which pig farmers have been treated. I shall fight and fight again to make the Government change their mind.

2.6 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The arguments used by the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) did not do pig farmers a good service. I probably represent a level of pig production comparable to that which he represents. In the past few weeks, I have sat down with large-scale pig farmers and their advisers in my constituency and I am well aware that they are concerned about welfare.

If there has been a full debate on the Bill today I would have been prepared to engage in that constructive debate and to ensure that their concerns were taken into account as we move into the transitional phase. That is legitimate, as the Government have said that they will introduce regulations and I think that farmers' worries need to be considered. However, I do not in any way withdraw my support for the Bill.

One of the reasons why I support the Bill is my belief that public opinion is demanding this change of our farmers, and it does farmers no good to have representatives such as the hon. Member for Bridlington telling them that he is not interested in what the British public want or what Parliament wishes as regards animal welfare demands. Essentially, that is what the debate is about and that is what we should have been debating this morning.

I welcome the fact that the Government have said that they will introduce their own regulations in a similar format. I hope that the Minister will not regard this as a discourtesy, as it is not intended as such, but I think that his position has become clearer, and was put in more forthright way, than it was on Second Reading. Our debates on the Bill have helped to crystallise his Department's thinking and to raise the standard of the debate within the European Community.

We have to accept that there is a north-south divide within the European Community on animal welfare matters. The hon. Member for Bridlington simply says that because of that divide we have to accept that the argument must be lost. I am pleased to hear the Minister say that he does not intend to lose that argument, but will take it to the heart of the European Commission and make Britain the member that will lead the demand for improved animal welfare standards—a demand which ultimately has to penetrate the entire market. In due course, I believe that these matters will even become of greater concern outside the United Kingdom.

I hope that the Government accept that there are those involved in the industry who accept that there should be change but who say that if change must come, their ability to adapt, the time scale, the costs involved and the necessary research should all be taken fully into account. The Minister will be aware of the concern about pigs in large-scale units. However, things can happen to free-range pigs, too. They suffer from udder biting and from broken backs and legs during the lactation period. I am sure that those points would have been made in support of the amendments of the hon. Member for Bridlington, had he moved them. I should not have supported the amendments, but I would have pressed those arguments. The leading pig research unit in Scotland is in my constituency. It has said that if change is to come about—it accepts that it is the will of Government that it should come about—it will need to find ways to separate the pecking order out very early on to avoid such incidents.

Mr. Maclean: Perhaps I could reassure the hon. Gentleman by saying that we intend to continue with a lot of research into this and other matters relating to alternative welfare systems for pigs during the phase-out period, to the end of 1998, and that we shall probably continue with research beyond that date.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to the Minister for saying that, which was all that I was looking for in the context of this short debate.

The hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) has done a great service by introducing the Bill. It is a matter of great regret that he has been forced to withdraw it, although I accept that he did so in the context of regulations that are to be applied in any case. It is never satisfactory when Bills are frustrated by procedural means rather than by an honest exchange in debate and a vote on the issue, for that is when the will of Parliament determines what is to happen rather than tactical procedures. It will anger many people in the country who lobbied hard and believed that they had won the day on the Bill. The only saving grace is that the Government have had the integrity to honour the provisions of the Bill. Provided that they continue to do so, those people may be satisfied and mollified. Frankly, though they will not think much of Parliament. I could not defend Parliament's behaviour to them and I would not attempt to do so.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I, too, am sorry that the Bill is being withdrawn. I wanted to speak on behalf of my constituents. I took part in an earlier debate this morning on an issue that affected my constituents. My name is also down to speak in the debate on the Registered Homes (Amendment) Bill because I have an interest in that. I take amiss some of the remarks that were made by the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), and also the uncharacteristically ungracious remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) as I came into the Chamber.

My interest has always been human welfare. Part of that has to be the provision of clean, cheap, safe food. That includes the welfare of people who work with animals. Animal welfare is of great importance. If my postbag is anything to go by, I suspect that some of those who write to me on animal welfare issues—whales, dogs or whatever—are frequently more agitated about those matters than those who write to me about human welfare issues.

The problem is that some of the animal rights proposals, which might have formed part of the Bill and might still yet form part of the regulations, are anthropomorphic. They assume that animals have the same feelings and needs as we have. They tend to forget the brutality that some species show to each other, expecially at certain times in the reproductive cycle. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) referred to that point, and it is one to which I should like to return.

I ought to say to my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston, who introduced the Bill, that any pig farmer who supports the Bill's provisions does not need the Bill. He could introduce new rearing methods all by himself. There is no law that says that he cannot introduce different methods. He can indulge in whatever form of husbandry he is happiest with and that he feels his stock is happiest with.

There is a substantial pig farm in my constituency. I am well acquainted with Mr. John Robinson, the manager of Midland Pig Farms. I have visited the establishment on a number of occasions. It is expanding. There has been a substantial amount of investment in it, and it produces some of the finest quality meat to be found anywhere in Europe. I am very pleased that it is there. The farm does not use girths or tethers, but it does use stalls for breeding sows. The boars have plenty of room. The fattening sheds are large and comfortable. The gilts run outside. Clearly, therefore, there is a technical reason why the sows are in stalls. There is plenty of room for them not to be in stalls. That is not the problem. I understand that the main purpose of the stalls is simply to prevent the sows from rolling on the piglets, which is what would happen naturally. No doubt the animal rights people would have a fit about the death of baby pigs, and that would be the cost of changing the system.

The hon. Member for Gordon was correct in saying that there are other problems in breeding sows when put with other sows. The pig farmers in my constituency tell me that the animals fight and go in for unpleasant habits like vulva biting and general bullying. I was told that sows are not very sociable and that a sow's worst enemy is another sow. I was advised that losses of sows under the system being proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston could be as much as 70 per cent. higher than in stalls—for example, in loose housing or cubicle housing. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take those issues on board. If that is right—I can think of no reason why my constituents should tell me a lie—and if losses under the system proposed by the new legislation are 70 per cent. higher—and by losses I understand deaths of animals—what has happened to animal welfare? I stand here as an ordinary Back Bencher asking where is animal welfare if the changes intended to promote it result in the deaths of more animals and changing the system results in more cruelty.

I take on board the points that have been made about making sure that the changes proceed at the same speed throughout Europe. I am always pleased when Britain leads Europe and when we are able to show that our standards are higher than those in the rest of Europe and encourage the rest of our European neighbours to follow suit, but it is worth remembering that in Spain large numbers of stalls are being put in. We know that, because the stalls are being manufactured in Britain. We may well find ourselves importing meat produced in other countries when we have introduced regulations that restrict our own farmers.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston has seen fit to withdraw his Bill, but we look forward to what the Minister and the Government propose in future.

2.16 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I shall be brief, as I hope that we shall salvage something from the wreckage of this morning and that my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) will be able to introduce a measure that will be of great benefit to his and my constituents.

I am particularly sorry that the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) found it necessary to make the Bill a partisan matter. I have the honour to be the vice-chairman of the all-party animal welfare group. The chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Dame J. Fookes) is not known for her socialist leanings, but that group stoically and consistently has given support to the measure brought before the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body). It is not a partisan matter; it is an all-party matter and the all-party animal welfare group counts among its numbers large numbers of hon. Members from both sides of the House.

I am particularly sad that my hon. Friend has found it necessary to withdraw the Bill this morning, not because we have lost the measure—we have not, and I hope that the public will understand, because of the statement made by my hon. Friend the Minister, that the measure will go forward—but because the wrong message may go out from the House to Europe. It is our proud boast in the House of Commons and in the country that we blaze a trail in animal welfare matters and that we have not been afraid to go before the Council of Ministers, the European Commission and the European Parliament and to say that we will not tolerate unpleasant practices that do no service to the health and welfare of the animals that we seek to protect. That is why many of us gave our forceful support to the Pig Husbandry Bill and to the measures being put forward to implement the minimum values rule on the exportation of live animals, particulary equines. Many people in the House and the country feel extremely strongly about that. It would be a tragedy if a message went out to the European Commission, the Council of Ministers or the European Parliament that suggested for one minute that we were going soft on any of these issues.

Despite what has happened this morning, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will go to the Council of Ministers and the Commission and say, with all the force that he can muster, that the United Kingdom will continue to blaze a trail in Europe on animal welfare matters. I hope that he will be neither ashamed nor afraid to say that long and loud and that we will never tolerate practices that do not coincide with animal welfare.

2.20 pm

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks.): My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) will recall from the Second Reading debate that my principal concern about the Bill was that it might introduce unfair competition. It was interesting to hear the hon. Gentleman talk about the initiatives that may come out of directorate general 6. That is most encouraging. If there were real determination in the European Commission and across the Community to tackle the issue as one Community, we would all happily accept and support any initiative that resulted. But some of us are still a bit sceptical—as the House heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend)—whether such unity of action will be forthcoming, and my hon. Friend the Minister urged caution in that respect. It is easy to get the Commission to talk about things. It is much harder to get it to agree on them and enforce them throughout the Community. Certainly what we have heard from Italian Ministers and other Italian sources in the past couple of weeks has not in any way suggested that it will be easy to achieve European Community agreement on these matters.

We look to my hon. Friend the Minister to press the matter in Europe before he introduces regulations in place of the Bill. We look to him, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) said, to blaze a trail and say that if we are to take action, we expect the European Community to fall into line and adopt the same procedures—otherwise, as the Minister implied, British farmers will be at a competitive disadvantage.

It is because some of us were, and remain, worried about that, that we tabled reasonable amendments to the Bill which would have been considered had my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston not sought to withdraw it. We have every right to resent the remarks of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), who accused us of tabling wrecking amendments. The hon. Gentleman also spoke disparagingly of my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) on the grounds that he left the Chamber when he had finished speaking. The hon. Gentleman has now done exactly the same himself. The hon. Gentleman accused my hon. Friends and me of representing vested interests and of committing a crime by tabling amendments in an attempt to defend our constituents' interests. We are meant to defend our constituents' interests; that is one of the reasons why we come to the House. I hope that if, in a few years' time, the hon. Gentleman tables amendments to legislation that threatens businesses in his constituency, he will not be accused of committing a crime or of representing vested interests just because he is attempting to alleviate matters. The hon. Gentleman's speech was foolish and intemperate and, following it, he has sunk in stature as an Opposition spokesman. He must have been taking too many lessons from the Leader of the Opposition, who often displays a similarly intemperate and ineffective manner. I wish that the hon. Gentleman had remained to hear my remarks. He will have to read them instead.

My hon. Friend the Minister should press as hard as he can in Europe for a common European agreement. I urge him also to meet again those of us who are concerned about the effects of the regulations to discuss whether there are other ways in which they can be improved. It is difficult to over-emphasise the importance of fair competition—a level playing field, to use the cliché that we hear so often in agriculture debates these days.

There is a serious danger for the pig industry in Britain. It has not had any special support. It has not relied on subsidies. It has had to cope with a free market in recent years and it has done so without the support of the taxpayer. The industry would be asked to compete with one had tied behind its back if the regulations were passed without European Commission agreement on them. We would probably see more pigmeat imported into Britain, produced by the very system to which people have objected—the stall and tether system.

I am sceptical about the argument that the consumer will lead the way by looking for meat that is produced in a better way. We are short of evidence about that. Price still dominates, so the importance of European agreement is high. If we did not have European agreement, we would once again have shot ourselves in the foot. We always seem to be more keen—rightly so—than our European Community partners on enforcing regulations.

The Minister has already reassured the House, but I want him to take away from the debate the message from many of us that we look to him to press the matter with the utmost vigour in the European Commission and the Council of Ministers. I hope that he will also pay attention to the misgivings that many of us have—they were the reasons behind one of our amendments, although it was not a wrecking amendment. I am glad to see the hon. Member for Caerphilly back in the Chamber. I have been talking about him in his absence and now he has come back to listen to the rest of what I have to say. I remind him that our amendments were not wrecking amendments. They were designed to improve the legislation in the interests of our constituents.

[Mr. William Hague]

One amendment dealt with the first 35 days after weaning. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take account of that amendment and listen again to the arguments. The first 35 days are a particularly important time in the 165-day cycle of the sow. The greatest problems of stock management and welfare arise in the first 35 days after weaning, if one does not have either a good stockman —my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston knows a great deal about good stockmanship—or a stall system. It is in the first 35 days that the stockman's skills are most often required. One needs ease of access to the sow, easy identification of the sow and calm conditions in which to look after the sow. A good stockman can provide those things, but the skills are in short supply. My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston gave good reasons why they are in short supply. But the fact is that they are in short supply and that is the position with which we must deal. Perhaps we do not disagree on that.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will listen to the arguments about the vulnerable time in the cycle of the sow. Certainly, that is the point about which pig farmers in my constituency are more worried than anything else. Their opinion is that enormous damage would be done to the industry if the measure were adopted in this country but not in other European Community countries, and that the greatest damage would be due to the implications for the first 35-day period. The condition of sows in that period varies greatly. They often require individual attention. They have lost their strength from the milk that has been drawn out of them in previous weeks and they need to be looked after individually. It is also important——

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. We have the Minister for Health here. This morning 600 job cuts were announced at Guy's hospital. Now this afternoon we hear that 300 more jobs are to go at the Bradford hospital trust. The Government are standing by doing nothing while their business managers are cutting the national health service. The Minister is here; will she come to the Dispatch Box?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Lady makes her point at 2.30 pm, I shall deal with it then.

Mr. Hague: It is also important that people understand that during that 35 days serious injuries can often occur. Sows bully and become aggressive towards each other as they try to establish a social hierarchy. That is another reason why particular attention must be paid to the first 35-day period. Again, I hope that my hon. Friend listens to that argument.

Normally towards the end of that 35-day period farmers carry out a pregnancy test, for which they require sows to be still. They use what appears to be head-bone apparatus—

It being half past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Hospitals (Job Losses)

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. This morning I raised a point of order calling for a Minister in the Department of Health to come to the House to take responsibility for and explain the cut of 600 jobs at Guy's hospital trust. The Minister was not available. We now have a Minister present. We have had further news that 300 jobs are to go in Bradford as a result of the setting up of a hospital trust. The Government are standing by and Ministers are failing to take responsibility while their business managers butcher the health service. Are we prepared to let this go on, or will you, Madam Deputy Speaker, use your influence to bring the Minister to the Dispatch Box to answer our points?

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I represent one of the Bradford constituencies and both St. Luke's and the Bradford royal infirmary treat my constituents. The announcement that 300 jobs are to go is a real blow to the people of Bradford. I urge you to support our request for the Minister for Health to make a statement because this is a serious and important matter. Just as we predicted, £7 million is being cut from the national health service budget through the trust in Bradford. The trust has nothing to do with the NHS. It represents the enemies within the NHS, and it is time that we had a statement.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. These matters are raised in the House of Commons because they are relevant to people outside. The House of Commons should debate the matter. The Government who introduced the legislation on opting out, which has already resulted in 900 job losses at two hospitals, have a duty to explain why this has happened. Furthermore——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I have listened carefully to the three points of order, all of which are related. As the House knows, on Fridays statements are made at 11 o'clock.

Mr. Skinner: There was none.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Allow me to finish. I know full well that no Minister has informed Mr. Speaker that he or she wishes to make a statement today. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] Order. If the Minister for Health wishes to raise a point of order, of course I shall hear it.

The Minister for Health (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is important to make it clear that the whole philosophy behind the reforms in the health service is——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Speaker has not given permission for a debate on this matter. If the Minister wishes to raise a point of order with me, I must listen to it.

Ms. Harman: Further to that point of order——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister cannot make a statement on which she will take questions. Is she raising a point of order?

Mrs. Bottomley indicated dissent.

Ms. Harman: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy speaker. Could the Minister, further to this point of order, please say that she will make a statement to the House on Monday about the cuts in services under the hospital trusts?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must pursue these points of order on Monday when we resume our next parliamentary business.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Can you and your colleagues do something about the fact that the Government have abused our proceedings today? At 8.30 am I alerted the Minister's office to the fact that I intended to raise in the House today the cuts at Guy's hospital and that the matter should be dealt with. I was told that two Ministers in the Department of Health were available in London throughout the morning.

Subsequently, we debated the Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill. Although it is technically a private Member's Bill, we know that it is supported by the Government and that they sought a private Member to introduce it. There was a speech of two and a half hours on that Bill and, although it did not prevent the passage of the Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Bill, it stopped the Pig Husbandry Bill being debated to a conclusion. In all probability, that Bill would have had the support of the House. All that time we did not hear a word nor receive a visit from a health Minister.

It is not good enough for the Minister for Health to come to the House now simply to say, if she was minded to do so, that the Government have no responsibility. I am sure that the hon. Lady intended to say that the whole idea behind the health service reforms is that Ministers will not answer for independent, self-governing trusts. That is unacceptable.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that I can help the House. Mr. Speaker has ruled that it will not be too late for him to hear applications on this matter on Monday. The matter must now be left to our next parliamentary day —Monday next.

Hospitals (Job Losses)

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Would you accept an application under Standing Order No. 20 for an emergency debate at the earliest opportunity on the cuts in the national health service?

Madam Deputy Speaker: As I have told the hon. Lady and the House, Mr. Speaker will consider the matter on Monday morning. I advise the hon. Lady to make an application to him then.

Antarctica

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. David Davis.]

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Minister for Health rose to her feet and said a few words, but declined to continue. Will you inform Mr. Speaker that a Minister was here but, on the advice of another Minister, decided to keep her mouth shut instead of being accountable to Parliament. The Minister was attempting to contribute. Perhaps that will help Mr. Speaker to make up his mind to accept an application for a debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Mr. Speaker is aware of what takes place in the Chamber. Hon. Members are now taking time from the Adjournment debate. I hope that they understand their responsibility in making points of order at this stage.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey) rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have dealt with all the points of order relating to that.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North) rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it a fresh point of order?

Mr. Gale: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. It must be a matter for the record that the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) was a travesty. My hon. Friend the Minister for Health was prepared to speak, but you, Madam Deputy Speaker, ruled her out of order.

Mr. Simon Hughes: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I wish to say that I shall block all Government business until we have a statement about Guy's hospital.

2.43 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The subject that I am raising is of great importance both to what goes on in the House and to the views of millions of people around the country. More significantly, we are at the apex of a decision about the future of one of the world's last great wilderness areas—the Antarctic.

The British Government's role in the discussions about the future of the Antarctic is not only less than helpful, but positively dangerous for the protection of a fragile ecosystem whose destruction would have enormous consequences for the whole world. We have an opportunity to make a decision that the great wilderness area should be declared a wilderness park for the benefit of all humankind. In doing so, we could show our concern to preserve the wilderness area. Alternatively, we can go down the road of smash, grab and destroy, to which the minerals exploration charter, which the British Government are pursuing, would lead us.

The Antarctic has fascinated many people over many centuries. One of the greatest poems in English, "The Ancient Mariner" by Samuel Taylor Coleridge, describes the voyage of Captain Cook in which he discovered for

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

Europeans much of the Antarctic. Coleridge gives a brilliant description of the fragile ecosystem in the Antarctic. He writes:

"And ice, mast-high, came floating by,
As green as emerald."

That is an evocative description of a beautiful and wild place.

Tragically, Captain Cook, although a wonderful ecologist who sought to preserve the ecosystems that he discovered and whose writings sought to preserve what he recognised, was killed because of a misunderstanding in the Pacific. Unfortunately, his discovery of channels into the Antarctic led to the destruction of many of the sea mammals there. It led to the whaling industry, which came mainly from Britain. The carnage of the whales of the Antarctic followed and the subsequent damage to the water ecosystem was incalculable. Some of the damage has been repaired by the growth of fish stocks but the whale is still, tragically, a seriously endangered species. The world is at last waking up to the wondrous nature of the whale and to the need to preserve it. However, we must recognise that in our destruction of the whale population, we are destroying one of the largest and most intelligent mammals on this planet. If we continue that destruction, it will lead to the whale's extinction. There is a lesson for us in our treatment of the whale and especially of the huge blue whale. If we allow that treatment to continue, we shall contribute to the destruction of the whole continent of Antarctica.

The history of the Antarctic reveals the acquisitive nature of mankind, which has gone to the area to take from it and to destroy it. However, some have sought to recognise the beauty of Antarctica and to preserve it. Others have sought to exploit it for the potential mineral wealth beneath it. We must recognise that much of the scientific work there has been valuable. Joe Farman's discovery with the British Antarctic Survey of the existence of the hole in the ozone layer was possible only because scientific research was being undertaken in the Antarctic. I stress that it was scientific and not commercial research. Similarly the discovery through drilling into the ice cap of the levels of impurity in the world's atmosphere 100 years ago, 500 years ago and 1,000 years ago was possible only because the Antarctic is an area of peace and of scientific discovery and because it is not an area of commercial exploitation—yet.

We should recognise that if we do not protect what is there, we are destroying not only an ecosystem, but the possibility of discovering more of the damage that human activity has already done to the world's environment—the air and the seas. We shall pollute and destroy for ever something that is incredibly beautiful and incredibly fragile. Antarctica is a dry place and a fragile ecosystem which is easily destroyed.

A fuel oil spill from a survey ship that was minor by world standards did enormous damage in the Antarctic. Damage has been caused through the construction of runways and bases and the bad management of some of the bases has also caused great damage. We should think of the consequences of the Exxon Valdez disaster, which was terrible for Alaska. We should think of the damage caused to the Gulf by the oil spills, which continue. If we translate that to the coldest part of the world, we find that there is less natural biodegradable action by the sea to resurrect what was there.

The Antarctic is a fragile place. That concern about the fragility of its environment led to expeditions and explorations and finally to the 1959 treaty, which was a remarkable document for its time. That treaty was signed at the height of the cold war by many nations which recognised the Antarctic as a place of peace, of scientific exploration and of the free movement and publication of all information discovered there.

But there have been ominous movements in recent years, leading up to the minerals convention of 1988. Those ominous movements saw the Antarctic not as a place of scientific research—a place to be preserved for its wonder and beauty for future generations—but as a place from which minerals could be exploited.

The British Government led the way in promoting the minerals convention and put through the House the Antarctic Minerals Act 1989, which included some fundamental changes in policy towards the Antarctic. I will explain two of those changes. For the first time, it was said that the exploration of minerals in the Antarctic could take place for commercial purposes and that the information gained from the exploration, being of commercial value, should be in the ownership of the mineral or oil company. Once we allow the exploration of potential mineral resources, as sure as night follows day, those who have invested millions in that exploration will want to exploit those resources.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the commitment and knowledge that he showed during the passage of that measure. I assure him that there is a fundamental divide between the Front Benches on this issue. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) made it clear in Madrid on the eve of the conference that the Labour party agreed that this last wilderness should be a world park and that the next Labour Government would not be in any way bound by what the British Government decided at the Madrid conference. It is crystal clear that the position of the Government—what can only be described as a messy compromise—is unsustainable and has been fatally holed by the move by Japan announced earlier this week.

Mr. Corbyn: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention, which underlines the importance that the Opposition parties place on Antarctica. We believe that an incoming Labour Government would support the idea of a world wilderness park and would not allow the headlong rush, which the British and American Governments seem keen to pursue, in favour of the minerials convention and the environmental destruction that will result.

When the Antarctic Minerals Act first appeared in the House from the other place, little interest was shown in it, either in Parliament or outside. I strongly compliment the work of the Worldwide Fund for Nature, Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace in promoting discussion and understanding about the issue, resulting in the avalanche of letters that hon. Members have received. As a result, the Antarctic is, and will remain, a major issue and a crucial decision must now be taken.

The British Government's role in all this resulted in support for the CRAMRA initiative—the convention and the regulation of Antarctic mineral resource activities

When we promoted the idea of a world park in Committee and on the Floor of the House when the 1989 measure was debated, the Government said that the world park idea had little support and that its creation was not possible. They thought that the only way to protect the Antarctic was by the minerals convention.

I do not accept that. No one nation should seek to grab parts of the Antarctic for itself. An examination of the map of the area reveals that an amazing series of conflicting territorial demands are being made. Chile claims one bit, Argentina another, while another part is claimed by both. The United States claims some, as does Britain, and the list goes on. Virtually every piece of land that forms the Antarctic is claimed by some country.

We cannot allow the idea of territorial claims to get in the way of what must be done to protect the area. Nor can we hand the future of the Antarctic over to the world's oil and mineral companies. It must be settled on an international basis, and the only way to do that is to accept that it is a zone of peace, of non-military activity and of scientific research, so long as all the results of that research are published. Once we allow the idea of commercial ownership of the results of research to enter into the matter, we face serious problems.

At the conference in Vina del Mar in Chile last year, the British Government pursued their idea of a minerals convention, for which there was some support and some opposition. Thankfully, that conference did not decide to support the minerals convention or mineral exploration. Instead, its delegates deferred decision for an environmental assessment, largely promoted by the then Government of Chile, to the Madrid conference which is now taking place.

Matters have changed dramatically at the Madrid conference. Far from being alone and isolated, as New Zealand and Australia were to begin with in their support of world park, their proposal has now come much more into the mainstream of discussion. New Zealand and Australia fully support the idea of a world park, as do a number of other countries, including France. That is important because the power of those countries in support of that idea are considerable.

A large majority of countries have basically supported the notion of a world park or, at least, a long moratorium on mining activities. That majority includes the Soviet Union, which now appears, in the words of President Gorbachev, to support the idea of the protection and preservation of the continent rather than its destruction and exploitation. Among those countries which apparently have the least concern for the environment of the Antarctic are Britain and the United States. It is important that the British Government put on record today their exact intention and what they are doing at the Madrid conference.

The case for a world park is overwhelming. If we turn our backs on the idea of a world park, we shall get mineral exploration, with companies rushing in in Klondike-like competition—perhaps not this year or next year, but in five or 10 years' time. Those companies will be more concerned about what they can get out of the ground of the Antarctic than about protection of the fish stocks, the atmosphere and the land on which they are working. First and foremost at stake for those companies will be commercial interests, and scientific research will take second place. Research into the effects of the pollution of the air over centuries is not of commercial interest, whereas the exploration of oil, coal, manganese, tin and other minerals is. Therefore, there will be a gradual twist and the destruction will continue for a long time.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is not there a risk of military conflict arising if there are disagreements about the claims made under the minerals convention?

Mr. Corbyn: My right hon. Friend makes a valid point because, while the 1959 treaty debars military activity and the deployment of forces in the Antarctic, it is unclear who could give the authority for mineral exploration. Clearly, national Governments would want to support what they would perceive to be the interests of nationally owned or nationally recognised oil and mineral exploration companies. Then the potential danger of military action in the Antarctic, which my right hon. Friend rightly exposed, becomes a much more serious threat.

My case is perfectly simple and is, I believe, strongly and widely supported by millions of people around the country. The executive director of Greenpeace, Lord Melchett, sent a letter to a Foreign Office Minister this week stating:

"In your letter to MPs on 25 March 1991, you said: 'We now believe that consensus may be achieved through a moratorum on mineral prospecting and exploitation activities and we intend to promote this with our Treaty partners.' In fact, in Madrid, your representative said in his opening statement to the meeting, that the UK Government's preferred position was to see the minerals regime, CRAMRA, enter speedily into force, that the Government believe an unqualified ban on mining is irrational, and that you are upset at the rejection by other nations of the minerals regime."

The letter concludes:

"Further, if you are genuinely interested in consensus, I challenge you to say that you welcome the Japanese change of heart, and their statement that: It is important that all the Consultative Parties undertake strenuous efforts to reach consensus on the regulation of mineral resources activities at the Madrid meeting. Based on this consideration, the delegation of Japan is now in favour of a prohibition of mineral resource activities . . . (for) an indefinite period."

Millions in this country and many more around the world see that as a decision of great importance, because we are saying that we can no longer look on every corner of the world as a place to exploit for minerals. Instead, we should look to stop, protect and learn from what is there. People see the Madrid conference as a possibility of the world turning a corner on environmental and ecological issues. The Government are among those who are obstructing the wishes of millions of people to preserve Antarctica as a wilderness park for future generations. I hope that the opportunity provided by this debate will persuade the Government to say that they, like the Japanese, have had a change of heart and will now support the concept of a world wilderness park in Antarctica.

3 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): I congratulate the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on raising this subject, about which he knows a great deal, at this timely moment. As he said, the meeting in Madrid that is considering these matters will continue until 30 April. If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall move rather fast, as I wish to put the Government's position on the records before I sit down.

The future of Antarctica is a matter of considerable and justifiable public concern, with which the Government are in full accord. The meeting in Madrid will be an important stage in developing a consensus for the protection of Antarctica. I emphasise the word "consensus" because there can be no way forward without consensus. It is from that premise that our policy on Antarctica stems.

Our exploration and scientific work in the area is second to none. As the hon. Gentleman said, we have been involved in that part of the world for many years. Britain was first involved this century in 1908, and we were prominent in the drafting of the Antarctic treaty, which came into force in 1961, and to which the hon. Gentleman paid tribute. That treaty forms the heart of the Antarctic treaty system that manages, by consensus, all Antarctic affairs. It developed as a mechanism to deal with the escalating quarrels about the exercise of sovereignty in the Antarctic following the second world war. Its achievements have been substantial. Geo-strategic and sovereignty considerations together with super-power rivalry, were all factors that the treaty system had to encompass and tame.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I shall give way, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not seek to intervene again.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Government now give an undertaking to release to the Public Record Office all Cabinet discussion documents relating to mineral exploration and military activities in the Antarctic, rather than hiding behind the 50-year rule, as they are now doing?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The hon. Gentleman takes me by surprise. I cannot give such an undertaking—indeed, it would not be possible to do so in an Adjournment debate.

Later, the treaty also had to weather the conflicts that emerged in the north-south domain with proposals that would allow the continent to be exploited. For 30 years, it has proved itself effective in fulfilling its objectives. As an example of long-term international co-operation and collaboration, it is unparalled. For that reason, the maintenance of the Antarctic treaty system is the cornerstone of British policy in Antarctica.

For much of the treaty's 30-year existence, public interest in Antarctica has been limited, while a good deal of valuable work has been carried out by scientists, especially in the conservation of marine resources. The hon. Gentleman touched on that. We both know that the situation has changed dramatically. Public opinion is now seized of the importance for the whole world of Antarctica. Much of that attention is due to the excellent scientific work of the British Antarctic Survey. We know that the existence of the hole in the ozone layer was first brought to the attention of the world by that survey. Britain has long foreseen the need for environmental protection in Antarctica.

Although the environmental provisions in the existing Antarctic treaty system are far reaching, we believe that they need further strengthening to bring them into line with what we now know about environmental protection. We also recognise that a number of threats to Antarctica need to be dealt with as a priority. That includes not only mineral activity, although that aspect has now taken the limelight and is the focus of public attention. Debates on a ban on mineral activities failed to lead to agreement amongst Antarctic treaty consultative parties, and so later we were one of the prime movers in proposing a convention on minerals to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

In supporting the minerals convention, we argued against those who wished to retain the right to mine unilaterally and insisted that there were strict environmental safeguards. That was the purpose of our being involved in proposing the convention.

Six years later as the hon. Gentleman said, the convention was adopted by consensus after hard negotiation. We considered it to be a breakthrough. The convention was signed by 19 countries, including the United Kingdom, and would have prohibited the exploration and development of mining in Antarctica, unless agreed by all parties. In effect, it would have been an indefinite ban on mining, since any member could have vetoed indefinitely any application to mine.

However, it is now recognised that we are in a different position and we wish to pursue consensus. By imposing a legal framework to deal with any application for mineral activity that might be approved, those 19 countries which had signed the convention believed that the door had been opened just enough to encourage countries that might consider mineral exploration at some time in the future to abide by the rules. The signatories believed that a simple no to any mineral activity permanently would be in danger of being ignored completely, leading to an unregulated free-for-all. However, we now accept that there will not be a consensus on the basis of that convention and, as we wish to seek consensus, we are prepared to consider other ideas. As the hon. Gentleman said, just one year later, a number of countries, following Australia and France, announced that they would not sign.

For that reason, we moved quickly to call a meeting to discuss comprehensive measures for the protection of the Antarctic environment. The first session of meetings on this subject was held initially in Chile last November. The second is the current meeting in Madrid.

At the meeting in Chile, we proposed an environmental protocol to the Antarctic treaty, which was to form a broad framework on environmental protection, to be supplemented by annexes dealing with individual topics. This was to deal with the most immediate problems. Our environmental protocol approach was the one which found favour with the majority of the delegations. For it is of gravest concern to us and to them that significant progress should be made on the threats from marine pollution, tourism and waste disposal. The hon. Gentleman mentioned damage to that delicate environment caused by oil pollution, and I entirely endorse what he said.

The British Antarctic Survey is also involved in an extensive clean-up of British bases—no mean feat when wastes accumulated over many years, in the days when everyone was less environmentally aware. Little publicity is given to the efforts of the British Antarctic Survey in cleaning up Antarctica, but on this question also Britain's record is second to none. When compared with all those immediate threats of pollution to the Antarctic environment, the threat from mineral activity begins to take on a less immediate perspective.

The exploitation of minerals, if it is ever to take place, is for the far future, for no one knows whether there are any viable mineral deposits in Antarctica. No one knows whether they can mine, no one has the technology and no one has yet shown any inclination to do so. We always recognised that the discovery of abundant minerals in Antarctica would have a profound effect on the operation of the Antarctic treaty. Those countries that now demand a permanent ban on mining, but one supported by no legal safety net in the event of its collapse, are threatening the Antarctic treaty system. It is this weakening of that system that we fear most.

In the Antarctic treaty debates, various proposals have been made. Our concern is to ensure that the Antarctic treaty system deals with the mineral question before minerals are discovered. The way to do that, it seems to us, is to reach agreement that minerals activity can be carried out only if that would be compatible with the preservation of the Antarctic environment. Once we reach agreement on that, we can relax. Until we do so, we should have a prohibition on mineral activity. Let there be no doubt about that. At the meeting in Madrid, our delegation is promoting our proposal for a renewable ban, as was outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) in his letter to all Members of Parliament on 25 March.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) mentioned the word "park", which was also mentioned in public recently by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). It is still an ill-defined concept. We do not know quite what is being proposed. No one at the Madrid conference has raised it. It is not a matter for discussion. If concrete proposals were ever put forward, we should examine them, but while they are vague, we must be sceptical. For example, would a marine park prevent our legitimate continuing scientific work in the Antarctic environment? Such a concept would be unacceptable, if it were to include that. We do not know. The hon. Gentleman nods, but, with great respect, we have not had the details.

Mr. Anderson: No one has a closely defined position, but what is clear is that it would prevent mining operations. Do not the Government accept that their position has been wholly undermined as, kicking and screaming, they move from compromise to compromise? The Government's position, as they approach Madrid, has now been undermined by the switch in Japanese policy.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's question because I must finish my remarks. However, he ought to look at the Japanese proposals most carefully before he draws complete and clear-sighted conclusions from them.

Our position does not, we believe, create expectations of the inevitability of mining in the future. Rather, it recognises that it may indeed be a possibility and that we should have a plan to cope with it. That is realism rather than fanciful idealism. Common sense tells us that this must be right.

Our objective is most certainly the protection of the Antarctic environment. In order to achieve it, we must ensure that the Antarctic treaty parties return to consensus as soon as possible. It is no use proceeding unilaterally. That is our objective. Our delegation at Madrid is working to achieve that precise consensus. I hope that the House will support it.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twelve minutes past Three o'clock.

TRANSPORT

Executive Agencies

Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has identified any further candidates within his Department for executive agency status under the "next steps" programme.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have decided that the Transport and Road Research Laboratory should become a candidate for executive agency status under the "next steps" initiative.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 21 March, Official Report, column 219, on the marine pollution control unit in the Gulf, if he will make a statement on the results of the MPCU's actions in co-ordination of commercial offers of counter-pollution personnel and equipment from British companies.

Mr. McLoughlin: The purpose of the marine pollution control unit's co-ordinating activities has been to alert prospective customers in the Gulf to what counter-pollution equipment and personnel are available from British companies. Thereafter, it is for customers to take up whatever offers, if any, they wish to pursue. To date, three contracts have been let to British companies as the result of the actions—one by the Department of the Environment and two by the International Maritime Organisation. These are:

a. DOE
DESMI Engineering Ltd, of Newcastle under Lyme. The supply of six Heavy Duty Oil Skimmers. These were presented to the Government of Bahrain by HMG as described in my answer of 21 March.

b. IMO
(1) Alba International Ltd, of Aberdeen. Clean-up feasibility study for Musallamiyah Bay. An area of ecological importance given high priority by the Saudi Arabian Government.
(2) Alba International Ltd., of Aberdeen. Clean-up of the coastline of Karan Island, off the Saudi Arabian coast. The most important breeding ground in the Gulf for Green Turtles.
Both IMO contracts are being funded from the IMO Gulf fund to which a number of countries have contributed, including the United Kingdom.

Cars (Fuel Efficiency)

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are his Department's projections of the change in the average fuel efficiency of cars between 1991 and 1996.

Mr. Chope: Improvements in the fuel efficiency of vehicles that have occurred in past years are now increasingly reflected in the overall vehicle fleet. The Government do not make projections of fuel economy for vehicles. Such improvements will depend on motorists' demands for more fuel-efficient vehicles and on the ability of manufacturers to respond.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that an environmental assessment is carried out of the various route options for the channel tunnel high-speed rail link.

Mr. Freeman: Environmental considerations form part of the British Rail's assessment of the route options for the channel tunnel rail link.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assumptions about toll rate and its rate of increase underlay the oral statement by the Minister of State on 14 January, Official Report, column 644, that current forecasts indicated that tolling for concessionaires for the second Severn bridge would not be necessary for more than 21 or 22 years; and what were the underlying assumptions about future traffic growth;

(2) by what date at the rate currently envisaged for 1992 under the current assumptions indicated in the oral statement by the Minister of State, Official Report, 14 January, column 644, payment for the Severn bridge will be completed; and what the annual toll income would be in the final year at constant prices;

(3) on the basis of current assumptions about traffic growth on the second Severn bridge and toll levels for 1992 indicated in the oral statement by the Minister of State on 14 January, Official Report, column 644, what at constant prices is the forecast annual income from tolls for each year from 1992 until the bridge is paid for.

Mr. Chope: The forecast that the concessionaire's actual tolling period for the Severn bridges would be 21 or 22 years, within the 30 year maximum allowed, was based on the toll levels set out in the Severn Bridges Bill, indexed for inflation in accordance with the provisions of the Bill. The forecast was based on the concessionaire's assumptions about future traffic growth, which were approximately as follows:

	Per cent. Per annum
1992-1995	2·7
1996-2000	2·4
2001-2005	2·2
2011-2013	1·8

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how the costs of operating the Severn bridge, excluding costs arising from original design faults, have moved relative to the retail prices index since the bridge was opened;

(2) if he will give a breakdown of the costs, excluding those arising from original design faults, of operating the Severn bridge in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Chope: The total cost of operating the Severn bridge in 1967-68, the first full year, was £1·032 million or £7·071 million at 1988-89 prices. This compares with a total cost of £12·753 million in 1988-89, the last full year for which figures are available. A breakdown of the figures is published in the Severn bridge accounts. The figures include the costs of toll collection, servicing debts, strengthening work to allow for vehicular loadings into the next century, and maintenance to make good general wear and tear normal for a structure of this size and age. The original design complied fully with the requirements of that time.

Trunk Roads

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the occasions in the last 10 years where one of the routes listed in the public consultation on a trunk road scheme went through or within 100 m of a site of special scientific interest but where the final route chosen did not;

(2) if he will list the trunk road schemes constructed through or within 100 m of a site of special scientific interest in the last 10 years;

(3) if he will list the occasions in the last 10 years where the draft line order of a trunk road scheme went through or within 100 m of a site of special scientific interest but where the confirmed line order did not.

Mr. Chope: This information could not be obtained without disproportionate cost. Every effort is made to keep trunk roads away from sites of special scientific interest. Where this is not possible we take particular care that the routes chosen do as little damage to the environment as practicable.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state (a) the average duration, in days, of a public inquiry into a trunk road scheme, (b) the average cost per day of holding a public inquiry into a trunk road scheme and (c) how many person days are spent by officers of his Department on public inquiries each year.

Mr. Chope: In the financial year 1990-91, the average duration was 16 days. More than half took less than 10 days, and a third less than five days.

Accurate costs to the Department of these inquiries, including consultants' fees and costs, are not identified separately from total scheme preparation cost. Inspectors' costs, which can be identified, could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Similarly, the amount of staff time, where it could separately be identified, could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Shipping Accidents

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which of the recommendations in the marine directorate's report, "The Human Element in Shipping Casualties" (i) have been implemented, (ii) it is intended to implement and to what timetable and (iii) will not be acted upon; and for what reasons.

Mr. McLoughlin: "The Human Element in Shipping Casualties" research project was designed primarily to aid the identification and recording of the human element in future accident investigations and to assess the feasibility of preventive measures. The marine accident investigation branch is generally in sympathy with the tenor of the recommendations covering investigation procedures and is adapting its methods accordingly. The report has been submitted to the International Maritime Organisation where it will be discussed by the maritime safety committee in May. The Department will consider its further actions in the light of those discussions.

Highway Cleaning

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he has made for ensuring that the cost provision of cleaning roads and embankments, currently the responsibility of highway authorities, is transferred to those authorities due to take over responsibility for road cleaning on 1 April under the Environmental Protection Act.

Mr. McLoughlin: The control totals for highway maintenance and all other services provided for 1991-92 in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England) as amended by the Revenue Support Grant Distribution (Amendment) Report (England) take account of the clarification of responsibility for street-cleaning for non-highway purposes brought about by the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

National Road Traffic Forecasts

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the terms of reference of the commission given to the MVA Consultancy to review the 1989 national road traffic forecasts.

Mr. Chope: The MVA Consultancy has not been commissioned to review the 1989 national road traffic forecasts. Those forecasts remain the best available view. The MVA commission is for a technical review of methodology, which in this field, as in others, needs tc be reviewed from time to time to see whether further improvements can be made.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Mammals

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce a code of practice to ensure that scientific procedures involving the dissection of mammals are not carried out within sight, sound or smell of other mammals.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Home Office "Code of Practice for the Housing and Care of Animals Used in Scientific Procedures"—1989; HC107—specifies that "major surgery and euthanasia should not be performed in rooms where animals are normally housed or where other conscious animals are undergoing procedures".

Local Government Finance

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases related to non-payment of the poll tax in Blyth valley have been dealt with by the magistrates court.

Mr. John Patten: In the period 1 April to 31 December 1990, Blyth valley magistrates court issued 15,478 summonses in community charge enforcement proceedings and made 12,451 liability orders.

Charity Commissioners

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the relevant biographical details of each of the charity commissioners which he took into account when making their appointments.

Mr. John Patten: In appointing the commissioners, my right hon. Friend took into account the range of their experience and the knowledge and skills which they could bring to the work of the commission.

Trespassers

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has concluded his review of section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have completed our review of section 39 and we expect to announce our conclusions very soon.

Jet Skis

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) Official Report, 22 February, column 277, on powers of local authorities in respect of control of the operation of waterborne jet ski machines, whether he proposes to increase such powers.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no plans at present to introduce legislation to increase authorities' powers in this area. This is one of a number of safety related issues being considered by a working group on water sports safety which has been appointed by the Minister for Sport. I understand that it will report its conclusions this summer.

Poll Tax Rally

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the anti-poll tax march and rally in central London on 23 March with particular regard as to how many officers were deployed and at what cost to public funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The policing of demonstrations in the Metropolitan police area is an operational matter for the Commissioner. I understand from him that 4,950 officers were deployed to police the demonstration on 23 March against the community charge and that the additional cost of policing the event, including catering and transport costs, is estimated at around £205,000.

Prisons

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the White Paper on the Government's legislative proposals arising out of the Woolf report.

Mrs. Rumbold: The White Paper to chart the future direction of the prison service in England and Wales is being prepared for publication later this year.

Armley Prison

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will put in the Library a copy of the report of the governor of Durham prison on his inquiry into prisoners moved from Hull to Armley.

Mrs. Rumbold: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the report of an investigation into allegations made by certain prisoners transferred from Her Majesty's prison Full Sutton to Her Majesty's prison Leeds in 1988. This report was prepared for internal purposes only and we do not plan to make it more widely available.

Miscarriages of Justice

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, for each of the last four years, he will list the sums of money that have been paid by his Department as compensation for miscarriages of justice involving wrongful imprisonment; and for each sum if he will give the length of the term of imprisonment served.

Mr. John Patten: The following information relates to payment of compensation in respect of imprisonment as a result of wrongful conviction, and is based upon the date on which the final payment of compensation was made. A number of interim payments, pending final assessment of compensation, have also been made during the period. The amounts shown are inclusive of any previous interim award.

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria he uses when considering whether to recommend the royal prerogative of mercy to grant a remission of sentence (a) on grounds affecting the original sentence and (b) on other grounds.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend considers recommending the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy in cases where (a) the sentencing court were unaware or misinformed about matters which may have affected the sentence, no avenue of appeal exists and it is not possible or appropriate to refer the matter to the Court of Appeal; and (b) where developments subsequent to the sentence and unconnected with the circumstances of the conviction suggest that special remission should be granted as an act of mercy, for example where a prisoner suffers from a terminal illness or gives valuable assistance to the authorities.

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used in assessing the quantum of compensation payable for miscarriages of justice (a) under section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 and (b) on an ex-gratia basis where there has been misconduct or default by the police or some other agency of the criminal justice system.

Mr. John Patten: The amount of compensation to be paid under both the statutory and ex-gratia schemes is decided on the advice of an independent assessor experienced in the assessment of damages. In making his assessment the assessor applies principles analogous to those governing the assessment of damages for civil wrongs. The assessment takes account of both pecuniary and non-pecuniary losses arising from the conviction and/or loss of liberty. The assessor also has regard, where appropriate, to the extent to which the circumstances leading to the wrongful conviction or charge might have been attributable to any action, or failure to act, by the police or other public authority.

Prison Leave

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to complete his review of the criteria applying to prison leave; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend hopes that the review will be completed and revised instructions issued to governors in the autumn. I will write to the hon. Member when the instructions are issued.

Poll Tax Payment

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the occasions where a custodial sentence has been imposed on someone for not paying the poll tax.

Mr. John Patten: Information about the number of committal warrants issued in community charge proceedings in the period 1 April to 31 December 1990 is available in the Library; comparable information for the period 1 January to 31 March 1991 will be placed in the Library within six weeks of the end of the quarter.

Immigration

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he arranged to ask the post in Islamabad to issue a visa to Mr. Niaz Mohammed, born on 1 January 1962 (Ref: IMM/81672), to enable him to join his wife in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A letter authorising the issue of an entry clearance to Mr. Niaz Mohammed was sent to the entry clearance officer at the British high commission in Islamabad on 11 April.

THE ARTS

Visits (Scotland)

31. Dr. Godman: To ask the Minister for the Arts if it is his intention to visit Glasgow during the Mayfest and Edinburgh at the time of the Edinburgh international festival in order to view exhibitions and attend certain concerts and theatrical productions.

Mr. Renton: At present I have no plans to visit Glasgow during the Mayfest, but I do hope to visit the Edinburgh international festival. I am also visiting the Shetlands arts festival and the east coast of Scotland in early May.

North West Arts Board

32. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he has met the chair of North West regional arts board to discuss the impact of the poll tax on arts and libraries in the region in 1991-92.

Mr. Renton: No. The new chair of Arts Board: North-West was appointed at the beginning of this month. I intend to meet him regularly to discuss arts matters, as I have done with his predecessor.

Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra

33. Mr. Hind: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the level of public subsidy granted to the Royal Liverpool philharmonic orchestra.

Mr. Renton: I am pleased that it was possible for the Arts Council to increase its grant to the orchestra this year by 17 per cent., including an enhancement fund award of £100,000. I was delighted to attend the launch of the Royal Liverpool philharmonic orchestra's appeal in Liverpool on 18 January this year.

Yorkshire Arts Council

34. Mr. Battle: To ask the Minister for the Arts what objectives he has set the new chairman of Yorkshire regional arts council.

Mr. Renton: I have determined the overall framework for the new arts funding structure. Detailed objectives within this framework are a matter for discussion and agreement between the Arts Council and individual boards.

Arts Funding (North-West)

35. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he has visited the north-west region to discuss arts funding with local authority leaders.

Mr. Renton: I discussed arts funding during my visit to Liverpool in January this year. In addition, I regularly meet local authority representatives from the north-west who are involved in arts policy in the region.

Reserve Collections

37. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Minister for the Arts what is his estimate of the value of reserve collections in public museums and galleries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Information on reserve collections in public museums and galleries is not held centrally. Such collections are usually available to researchers, scholars and any interested party.

Arts Funding

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will introduce direct regional funding for the arts.

Mr. Renton: No, as the Arts Council makes allocations to the regions out of its total budget, taking account of the plans submitted by each region to do so.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Public Expenditure

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table, consistent with table 6 of his answer to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson) of 13 December, Official Report, columns 457-58, providing an otherwise identical analysis of the planning total.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is given in the table. The figures reflect the estimates of the planning total available when the data reported in the Official Report on 13 December were prepared.

[1] Programmes 15, 16 and 17 relate to expenditure programmes in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland covered by the Departmental Reports for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland (Cm 1515-1517).

[2] Responsibility for most expenditure in Northern Ireland rests with the Northern Ireland Office and Departments; this column includes certain expenditure in support of the agriculture and fishing industries, the costs of the NI Court Service and War Pension payments.

[3] Includes £305 million for costs associated with the privatisation of Short Brothers plc.

[4] Expenditure on arts and libraries in Northern Ireland is included with education and science.

[5] Includes contributions to European Communities and expenditure associated with general maintenance of government, such as tax collection and population registration.

Building Societies

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when it was determined that changing the timing of building societies' payments of income tax was intended to raise extra revenue;

(2) on how many occasions Ministers have stated that the building societies income tax changes announced in the 1985 Budget and in subsequent amendments were (a) not to yield extra income and (b) to yield extra income.

Mr. Maude: Ministers have always made it clear that the changes in the way building societies account for tax on interest and dividends paid would not involve the payment of extra tax.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the disputed tax awarded to the Woolwich Equitable building society was (a) extra tax or (b) the original expected tax.

Mr. Maude: The tax involved was that applicable to investors' interest and dividends paid in the period between 1 October 1985 and 5 April 1986. The House of Lords decided that the Inland Revenue had power to make regulations bringing these payments of interest and dividends into account but not to charge tax at rates in force for 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) on how many occasions the courts have ruled against the Government to the effect that the Woolwich Equitable building society should not have to pay extra tax following the 1985 Budget speech;

(2) if he will arrange for the judgments in the various Woolwich Equitable building society tax cases to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Maude: There have been two judgments in favour of the Woolwich Equitable building society in litigation over the application of the transitional provisions in the 1986 Building Societies Regulations.

In July 1987 the High Court held that the Inland Revenue did not have power to make regulations that sought to bring into account payments made by societies in transitional periods before 6 April 1986. That decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal in April 1989. In October 1990 the House of Lords concluded that the Revenue had power to bring the payments in the transitional periods into account but not to charge tax at the rates in force for 1985-86.

Copies of the judgments are available in the Library.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Soley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for the current financial year, his estimate of the number of cases in which relief will be given on mortgage interest payments tax relief, the average value of that relief per mortgagor, and the cost of that relief, for each of the following total income ranges (a) up to £4,000, (b) £4,001 to £5,000, (c) £5,001 to £6,000, (d) £6,001 to £7,000, (e) £7,001 to £8,000, (f) £8,001 to £9,000, (g) £9,001 to £10,000, (h) £10,001 to £12,000, (i) £12,001 to £15,000, (j) £15,001 to £20,000, (k) £20,001 to £25,000, (l) £25,001 to £30,000 and (m) over £30,000.

Mr. Maude: Available information is given in my reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on 13 March, Official Report, at column 552.

Invisible Trade

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) by what methods monthly invisible trade figures are calculated by other Community member states; and whether monthly invisible trade data produced by other Community Governments are directly comparable with Central Statistical Office statistics produced for the United Kingdom;

(2) what sampling method is used by the Central Statistical Office to calculate the monthly trade figures for invisibles; what changes in Central Statistical Office methods of calculating invisible trade figures have been made in each of the last 12 months; and what proposals he has to change the statistical method of calculating invisible trade figures.

Mr. Maples: Other Community countries, except the Irish Republic, require their residents to report individual payments to or receipts from overseas, usually above a threshold, and these data are used by the central banks to compile estimates of invisible trade. Only Germany, Greece and Spain choose to publish monthly invisibles estimates. The United Kingdom does not compile monthly figures of invisibles; the monthly figures shown in the monthly balance of payments press notice are either simply one third of the relevant reported quarterly figure or, for the most recent months, a projection. The projection for the most recent months is mainly an extrapolation from earlier quarterly estimates but it takes account of recent trends and of movements in exchange and interest rates. It is subject to considerable uncertainty.

All Community countries seek to compile invisibles estimates according to the guidelines on concepts and definitions issued by the International Monetary Fund. Therefore, the United Kingdom's quarterly estimates, which underlie the monthly calculations, are comparable with those for other Community countries.

The Central Statistical Office does not use sampling methods to calculate the monthly estimates of invisibles and it has not made any change to its methods for calculating these estimates in the past 12 months. The Central Statistical Office has no plans at present to change the way that it calculates monthly figures of invisibles, however this will be re-examined in the light of the recommendations of the review of balance of payments statistics. This is currently being carried out as part of the Chancellor's initiative on economic statistics which, among other things, is seeking to improve the quarterly estimates of invisibles. Details can be found in Economic Trends for March 1991, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate at constant 1990 prices of the invisible balance in each year since 1979; and what is his estimate of the value of United Kingdom produced crude oil for these years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information relating to the volume of invisible trade is only calculated at 1985 prices and only for services. Estimates for exports and imports of services at 1985 prices for the years 1979 to 1989 can be found in table 4.1 of the Pink Book "United Kingdom Balance of Payments" which is available in the Library of the House, or on the Central Statistical Office database which can be accessed through the Library. An estimate for 1990 will be included in the 1991 Pink Book, to be published in the summer.

The estimates of the value of United Kingdom produced crude oil, including natural gas liquids, for the years 1979 to 1990 are as follows:

1980	8·9

Earnings

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the growth of real take-home pay for a married man with two children who is on half male average earnings since 1978-79 each year to the latest date available.

Mr. Maude: The figures are given in the table.

Growth in real take home pay for married man with two children on half male average earnings:

1978-79 to:	Per cent.
1980-81	2·5
1981-82	−0·6
1982-83	0·6
1983-84	5·6
1984-85	9·8

1978-79 to:	Per cent.
1985-86	11·2
1986-87	15·2
1987-88	19·8
1988-89	23·1
1989-90	24·4
1990-91	24·5
1991-92	29·3

Notes to table:

(1) Real take home pay is taken to include child benefit to allow comparability with 1978-79 when support for families with children was given partly through child tax allowances.

(2) Income tax payments are calculated on the assumption that no tax reliefs are received other than the standard allowances and that earnings are the only source of income. NI contributions are calculated at the class 1 contracted-in rate.

(3) Where determinants of take home pay such as NICs or child benefit have varied during the course of a year, the average value for the financial year has been used.

(4) Average male earnings are the average gross weekly earnings of all full-time males on adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. These are assumed to be £307·90 a week in 1990-91 and £334·10 a week in 1991-92 using the Government Actuary Department's assumptions of 10 per cent. growth for 1990-91 over 1989-90 and 8½ per cent. for 1991-92 over 1990-91 as published in the 1990 autumn statement.

(5) Real changes are calculated using the average level of the Retail Prices Index in each financial year.

Income Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the answer given to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, of 6 March, Official Report, columns 165-66, taking account of the changes announced in the 1991 Budget and giving estimates up to 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: Latest estimates of the annual change in income tax liability resulting from the changes in tax rates, allowances, thresholds, and the restriction of mortgage interest relief to the basic rate are in the table. The 1978-79 income tax regime has been indexed to 1991-92 levels by reference to the statutory formula, and allowing for independent taxation.

For the purposes of these calculations the indexed regime of 1978-79 is applied directly to the income base of 1991-92. In practice, retention of the regime, indexed as appropriate, for the intervening years would have led to changes in the income base.

Average reduction in income tax per individual[1] in 1991-92 compared with 1978-79 indexed regime

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the answer given to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) of 17 January, Official Report, columns 559-62, taking account of the changes announced in the 1991 Budget and giving estimates up to 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: Updated figures for 1990-91 and estimates for 1991-92 are given in the table.

Notes to Tables

(1) Income tax payments are calculated on the assumption that the households receive no tax reliefs other than the standard allowances and only have income from employment. All earners, including wives, are assumed to pay Class 1 national insurance contributions at the contracted-in rate.

(2) Since 1990-91, husbands and wives have been taxed independently. Previously the tax liability of couples depended on their joint income. To permit comparisons with earlier years, the table therefore shows income tax and national insurance contributions paid by a married couple as a proportion of their joint income, assuming, as in the earlier years, that where both partners are earners, the husband and wife share the relevant multiple of earnings in the ratio 60:40.

(4) Average earnings are taken to be the average gross weekly earnings of all full-time males on adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. These are estimated to be £307·90 per week in 1990-91 and £334·10 per week in 1991-92, using the Government Actuary Department's assumptions of 10 per cent. growth over 1989-90 and 8·5 per cent. growth over 1990-91, as published in the 1990 autumn statement.

(5) The estimates of indirect taxes are based on equations derived from the 1985 family expenditure survey, uprated to later years using forecasts of aggregate tax receipts. They are based on the illustrative assumption that 10 per cent. of disposable income is saved. There are wide variations in spending patterns between households with the same composition and similar incomes and estimated payments of VAT and other indirect taxes are therefore approximate, even within the income range for which figures are shown. Outside this range, the margin of error is even higher and reliable estimates cannot be made. Because of sampling variation, there can be substantial differences between estimates obtained from family expenditure surveys for different years.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report, an analysis for the years 1984-85 to 1993-94, following the format of table 12.1 of Cm. 1515, of central Government support to local authorities outside the Secretary of State's responsibility.

Mr. David Mellor: The information requested, consistent with that given in the "Statistical Supplement to the 1990 Autumn Statement"—Cm. 1520—is given in the table.

Output Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give details of (a) the overall output and (b) the output per person engaged in each of the following industries, for the years 1979, 1980, 1985 and 1990, (i) agriculture, (ii) the steel industry, (iii) coal mining, (iv) the car industry, (v) the electrical goods industry, (vi) local government and (vii)the national health service.

Mr. Mellor: Estimates are not compiled on precisely the basis requested, but index numbers of output and of output per head are available for the following industry groups, on a 1985 = 100 basis, as shown in the table:

	Output				Output per head

Performance-related Pay

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the impact of performance-related pay.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Performance-related pay in the form of additional increments depending on assessment in annual reports now covers the vast majority of civil servants. Managers in departments have generally welcomed the introduction of performance-related pay as a means to attract and retain quality people and to motivate them to produce high sustained performance.

There are other ways in which pay is related to performance in the civil service. There is a special bonus scheme which departments can use to reward individuals or groups for particular achievements. In addition a number of agencies have introduced group bonus schemes which pay bonuses if staff beat targets for efficiency savings. Also the majority of industrial civil servants are covered by bonus schemes. All these schemes are designed to encourage efficiency and motivate staff.

Civil Servants (London)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many civil servants were employed in Greater London in 1980, 1985 and 1990; what is the projected number for 1995; and what is each figure as a percentage of the civil service as a whole.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Available information for the Greater London area covers civil servants employed in the London pay area, an area within an 18 mile radius of Charing Cross. The information for the years 1980, 1985 and 1990, is shown in the table.

Number of staff employed in the London Pay Area[1]

	Number in London	Total Civil Service	Percentage of Civil Service as a whole
1980	152,000	707,800	21·5
1985	126,600	619,600	20·4
1990	116,600	562,400	20·7

Source: "Civil Service Statistics".

[1] Non-industrial and industrial civil servants, full time equivalent (part-time staff count as half units).

No central forecasts have been produced for civil service staff numbers in 1995, to obtain the relevant data would involve a servicewide exercise at disproportionate cost.

Bloodstock (VAT)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rate of value added tax is charged upon bloodstock in the Republic of Ireland, France, Germany and the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The VAT rates for bloodstock in Ireland, France, Germany and the United Kingdom are respectively 2·3, 5·5, 7 and 17·5 per cent.

Theatre Tickets (VAT)

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will now remove theatre tickets from liability to value added tax.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have no plans to alter the arrangements for taxation of theatre tickets.

Public Sector Pensions

Mr. Dicks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his policy in respect of the appropriateness of a contributory element in public sector index-linked pension schemes;

(2) what would have been the effect on the Exchequer, in the last financial year where figures are available, of a contribution by civil servants to their pensions at rates of 5 per cent, 7 and 9 per cent. of their salary;

(3) what representations he has received regarding the benefits in respect of expenditure and on other counts of introducing a contributory pension scheme for civil servants; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Government are satisfied that the contribution arrangements in the public service pension schemes which they control are appropriate. The value of pension benefits, including index-linking, continues to be a relevant factor in public service pay determination. Our policy is to provide a remuneration package, including pay, pension and other conditions of service, which is sufficient to recruit, retain and motivate staff of adequate quality. Public servants therefore bear their share of pension costs in two ways: by contributions from pay, and through pay set at levels which take proper account of the value of pension benefits.

Civil servants make an overt contribution towards the cost of family benefits but in the main meet their share of pension costs through pay being set at levels lower than would otherwise be appropriate. If civil servants were to meet the whole of their share of the pension costs by overt contributions, the consequence for the Exchequer would be broadly neutral. This is because pay would need to be adjusted in order to offer a similar remuneration package to employees.

Representations are made from time to time about the civil service pension scheme. The Government have no plans to alter the way in which civil servants bear their share of pension costs in the foreseeable future.

Supply Estimates

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a list indicating the distribution of the 1991-92 supply estimates votes by size from the number under £1 million to the number over £5 billion, by £100 million steps.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested can be derived from table A.1 of the Summary and Guide to the 1991-92 Supply Estimates—Cm. 1454.

OECD

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what contribution has been made by Her Majesty's Government to the development assistance committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development since December 1990.

Mr. Maples: The costs of the development assistance committee and its working groups are met from the contributions of member states to the overall OECD budget. The United Kingdom share of the costs of the DAC in 1990-91 was approximately £160,000.

Mortgage Annuity Schemes

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will bring forward proposals in the Finance Bill to increase the tax relief limit on mortgage annuity schemes for older people.

Mr. Maude: No.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many older people are currently benefiting from tax relief on mortgage annuity schemes.

Mr. Maude: Information on the number of outstanding home annuity loans qualifying for tax relief is not available and a reliable estimate could be provided only at disproportionate cost. About 2,000 new home annuity loans qualifying for tax relief were taken out in 1990-91.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning the £30,000 limit on mortgage interest tax relief for loans used by older people to purchase annuity schemes.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has received a number of representations.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he has taken to encourage older people to raise money against their homes.

Mr. Maude: There are various schemes on the market for those wishing to release equity in their homes. They include interest-only mortgages, home income plans, home reversion schemes, investment bond schemes and roll-up loans.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has estimated the cost of raising the tax relief limit for mortgage annuity schemes for older people, from £30,000 to £60,000.

Mr. Maude: A reliable estimate is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Foundation for Sport and the Arts

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make it his policy to place advertisements for the posts of trustee for the Foundation for Sport and the Arts in the appropriate national journals or newspapers; what method and timescale he proposes to adopt for making appointments to the foundation; and if he will place in the Library a list of trustees to the foundation, together with the date on which they were appointed;

(2) what measures are included in the draft articles of association for the Foundation for Sport and the Arts; if he will place a copy of the draft articles of association in the Library, and a copy of the final articles of association once these have been agreed; if he will list in full the bodies he proposes to consult before agreeing the articles of association; and if he will make it his policy to include in the articles of association details of the ratio of allocation of the foundation's resources between sport and the arts.

Mr. Mellor: The proposal from one of the pools promoters was for a foundation set up as a trust by all three member companies of the Pools Promoters Association. In the first instance, it will be for the association to consider the detailed terms of the trust deed although, as the Chancellor made clear in his Budget statement on 19 March, Official Report, column 175, we will wish to establish that these are satisfactory before we could agree to a cut in pool betting duty. The procedures for appointing trustees will similarly be for the members of the association, acting within the terms of the trust deed. I will discuss with the pools promoters how best to ensure that hon. Members can be informed of the details of the trust and of the names of the trustees.

Heliports (London)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the reasons why Her Majesty's Customs and Excise now require a heliport on Sea Container house.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise neither require nor are seeking a heliport.

Seafarers (Tax Incentives)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to extend to seafarers who work in the offshore supply and standby industries and serve equal periods at sea the concession announced in the Budget on tax incentives to citizens overseas in the merchant navy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend's Budget proposal to extend the existing special tax relief for seafarers applies to United Kingdom resident seafarers working on ships overseas. The Government have no plans to extend the relief to seafarers on ships operating on the United Kingdom continental shelf, which is regarded as part of the United Kingdom.

Northern Ireland Customs Service

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give details of the progress that has been made to date on proposals to decentralise work within the Northern Ireland Customs service.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise have decided to relocate certain administrative VAT work to a new unit, which will employ around 100 staff, at Newry in Northern Ireland. Operations are expected to commence in late 1992.

Economic Growth (Statistics)

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table, for each year from 1979 to the present time, showing (a) the official Treasury forecast for economic growth in that year made at the time of the Budget, together with (b) the contemporaneous consensus of outside forecasts and (c) the eventual recorded outcome.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 22 March 1991]:

Local Income Tax

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rate of local income tax would be needed to yield the same sum as that required from the community charge in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 28 March 1991]: The rate of local income tax needed would vary between local authorities depending on the budgeted yield of the community charge in particular areas, local income levels and the precise way in which the system operated.

Accounting Practices

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of applying the proposal to extend the period for which a company can carry back a trading loss from one year to three years to losses in accounting periods ending (a) on or after 1 April 1990 and (b) on or after 1 October 1990; and what are the reasons why the necessary legislation will be introduced only at the Committee stage of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 28 March 1991]: The cost of applying the proposal to extend the period for which a company can carry back a trading loss from one year to three years is estimated at (a) £250 million in 1991-92 for accounting periods ending on or after 1st April 1990, and (b) £200 million in 1991-92 for accounting periods ending on or after 1st October 1990. The proposed legislation will be introduced at the Committee stage because it will not be possible to complete it in time for inclusion in the Finance Bill as published.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much income to the Treasury it is anticipated that the increase of 2·5 per cent. in value added tax for 1991-92 will raise.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is published in table 1.1 of the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1991-92.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much was raised in 1989-90 from value added tax.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: A total of £29,483 million. Further information is available in the 1989-90 report of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the balance of the cost of holiday accommodation for which deposits have been received by hotels and guest houses as part of an advanced booking contract, will be subject to the increased VAT rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The increased rate of VAT will apply to any balance outstanding from the date of the rate change—1 April—on holidays booked in advance. This is because the normal tax point for the supply of a holiday is when the services are performed by the hotel or guest house. While an earlier tax point is created by the receipt of a deposit—advance payment—it applies only in respect of the amount of money paid over. Guidance in VAT publications make this clear, as well as covering the position when there is a VAT rate change.

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the tourism industry on the effect of the increase in VAT on advance holiday bookings; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have received a number of representations. These have primarily concerned the need for a concession to be introduced whereby the old VAT rate of 15 per cent. would apply to any outstanding balances on holidays pre-booked before the date of the rate change, because otherwise the industry might have to absorb the increase. I am unable to accede to this request because of the existing tax point rules—which reflect EC law. The normal tax point for the supply of a holiday is when the services are performed by the hotel or guest house. While an earlier tax point is created by the receipt of a deposit—advance payment—this applies only to the amount of money paid over that time.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Association of British Travel Agents

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions his Department has recently had with the Association of British Travel Agents about financial protection for British holidaymakers booking holidays through the Association of British Travel Agents agents.

Mr. Leigh: ABTA has requested financial assistance from Government to help meet its liabilities arising from the collapse of Sun Living Ltd. I have made it clear that I do not consider it would be appropriate for public funds to be used for this purpose.

Taurus

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition by the international stock exchange relating to Taurus to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Redwood: My Department has received such an application and I am pleased to say that approval has been given for an exhibition relating to Taurus from 1 to 5 July.

Coats Viyella plc

Sir Charles Morrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether he will make it his policy to take into account the level of gearing by Coats Viyella plc in mounting its bid for Tootal Group plc before reaching a decision on whether to allow this bid to proceed;

(2) what assessment he has made of the relative level of gearing of a merged company consisting of Coats Viyella plc and Tootal Group plc if the current bid for Tootal Group is successful as against that which would have obtained if the two companies had merged by agreement in 1989; and what weight he will give to this in deciding whether to allow the bid to proceed.

Mr. Carr: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the prospective gearing of the combined company if the acquisition of Tootal Group plc by Coats Viyella plc is successful and on how Coats Viyella plc intends to fund the consequential rationalisation costs of such a merger.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration he is giving to the respective EC market shares for named brand textile products for Coats Viyella plc and Tootal Group plc in his consideration of the proposed takeover; if he will make it his policy to take into consideration the extent of which Coats Viyella plc has acted in accordance with the required accounting procedures in declaring its annual results for the last financial year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: In reaching his decision on whether to refer the proposed acquisition by Coats Viyella of Tootal Group to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will take into account all relevant aspects of the proposal, in the light of the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. Carr: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the figures supplied to his Department for the loss of profit made by (a) Coats Viyella and (b) Tootal Group plc from their respective United Kingdom manufacturing operations.

Mr. Redwood: No. In reaching his decision on whether or not to refer the proposed acquisition by Coats Viyella of Tootal Group to the MMC, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be taking into account the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. The director general's advice on merger references may contain commercially sensitive information, including financial information on the companies concerned, and is not made public.

Immingham Coal Port

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer the involvement of national Power and PowerGen in the financing and operation of the coal port development at Immingham to the Office of Fair Trading for consideration of the competition issues arising.

Mr. Redwood: Any agreement between the organisations concerned, if it is a registrable agreement under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976, is a matter for the Director General of Fair Trading. Any concerns in this respect should be put to the director general.

Parent Companies

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what Government policy is on safeguarding the trading positions of companies whose parent company has collapsed.

Mr. Redwood: Subsidiary companies are separate legal entities and do not necessarily encounter the same difficulties as their parent company. However, there are provisions within insolvency law that enable companies in difficulty to formulate plans for a return to solvency. These provisions are available to all types of companies, including subisidiaries.

East Timor

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he is prepared to publish in respect of the refusal of applications to export defence equipment to East Timor on grounds of their potential use against the civilian population in terms of numbers of such refusals, the proportion of applications or other illustrative figures.

Mr. Sainsbury: In the past 12 months, my Department has received no applications for export licences for goods consigned for East Timor.

Consumer Debt

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what figures he has regarding trends in defaults on credit cards and other consumer debt.

Mr. Leigh: There are no national periodic statistics of defaults on credit cards. The Central Statistical Office collects statistics on amounts written off by finance houses and other specialist credit grantors under agreements with consumers. The amounts written off in each of the last five years were:

	£ million
1986	243
1987	259
1988	276
1990	460

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the current members of the National Consumer Council, the Welsh Consumer Council and the Scottish Consumer Council, giving the relevant experience of each member; how many of the Councils are females; and what percentage of the total membership they comprise.

Mr. Leigh: The current members of the National Consumer Council (NCC), the Scottish Consumer Council (SCC), and the Welsh Consumer Council (WCC) are:

NCC:

Debt Defaults

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the percentage of consumer debt defaults directly attributable to financial difficulties caused by redundancy, long-term sickness and unemployment.

Mr. Leigh: This information is not available.

Iraq

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement on the United States Treasury's announcement on 1 April concerning companies and individuals in the United Kingdom and elsewhere said to be connected with Iraq.

Mr. Lilley: On 1 April 1991 the United States Department of the Treasury published a list of 52 companies and 37 individuals worldwide whom the Director of the Office of Foreign Assets Control had determined to be owned or controlled by or to be acting or purporting to act directly or indirectly on behalf of the Government of Iraq. Sanctions under United States domestic law were applied the same day to these companies and people. The effect was to make all those listed "specially designated nationals", to freeze their assets in the United States or in the hands of United States nationals or corporations outside the United States, and to make any unlicensed transaction with them a criminal offence under United States law. Thirty-three of the companies and 13 of the individuals were said to be based in the United Kingdom.

The Government had become aware early in February that the United States Treasury was preparing for eventual publication a list of companies controlled by Iraqis, including companies based in the United Kingdom. Although my Department obtained a copy of a draft list, through our embassy in Washington, the United States Treasury published the list on its own authority. I am aware that some companies have already said that their inclusion was a mistake. If any company or individual based in the United Kingdom believes that it or he has been wrongly included, my Department should be informed. It has already taken up certain cases and any company which wishes to discuss its inclusion on the list with my Department should contact my officials without delay.

The Government fully share the determination of the United States administration to enforce United Nations sanctions against Iraq, and in particular to prevent the export of arms to Iraq. We have taken the following key measures.

First, we are continuing to prevent the supply of goods to persons in Iraq, including companies controlled by Iraqi residents or Iraqi incorporated companies, or imports from Iraq in compliance with Security Council resolution 661. The legislation giving effect to the resolution applies to all persons and companies in the United Kingdom and to United Kingdom nationals and companies abroad. Compliance is carefully monitored. Very few breaches of this embargo have come to light, and these few cases are being pursued vigorously. The United States authorities have not alleged that the firms on this list have broken sanctions.

Secondly, we are continuing to maintain controls which have the effect of freezing the assets in the United Kingdom of persons and companies normally resident in Iraq on or after 4 August 1990, also in compliance with Security Council resolution 661. This embargo, too, is rigorously enforced.

Thirdly, for many years before Iraq's invasion of Kuwait exports of lethal military equipment to Iraq were prohibited by the Export of Goods (Control) Order. These controls, which apply to all persons and companies in the United Kingdom, remain in place, though they are in practice overtaken for the time being by the wider trade embargo introduced last August.

Export Representative Services

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the rate of usage by businesses of the export representative service in the case of (a) the United States of America, (b) Canada and (c) West Germany for each month from March 1990 to date.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 28 March 1991]: The information is given in the table.

Usage by businesses of the export representative service has been:

Film Industry

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make available the findings of the working party on the structure of the film industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: The film industry working party has not yet completed its work. We shall consider when to make the working party's findings available after the report has been received.

Pharmaceutical Patents

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to publish his response to the European Commission's proposals for supplementary certificates for pharmaceutical patents.

Mr. Leigh: I am pleased to be able to make a statement indicating the Government's attitude to the Commission proposals for a regulation concerning the creation of a supplementary protection certificate for medicinal products.

The Commission proposes that medicinal products—pharmaceuticals—which have taken over four years to bring to the market following patent application should be eligible for a period of supplementary protection, equal to the amount of patent life lost minus four years, subject to a maximum extension of 10 years. The broad result is that most medicinal products would be assured of 16 years effective protection.

We fully recognise the importance of patent protection for pharmaceuticals. Medicines are costly to develop and often easy to copy. An innovative industry must have a proper opportunity to secure a fair return. The United States and Japan already provide for the extension of patent term for pharmaceutical products and we wish to see broadly similar arrangements in the Community to avoid any distortion of competition which might occur.

The Commission's proposal needs to be considered in the context of the pharmaceutical industry as a whole. The market exclusivity which would go with supplementary period of protection would delay the entry of competitors into the market. This could result in the cost of pharmaceuticals being higher than it otherwise would be. We need to strike the right balance between a proper reward for the innovator and the encouragement of a competitive market. We must also take into account the considerable cost of pharmaceuticals for the national health service.

In judging the right period of supplementary protection we need to look at the historical evidence. The average period of protection for new chemical entities in the 1960s was around 13 years. More recent evidence on the products that matter in terms of company profits shows a similar overall position, and the level of research and development remains high. We do accept however that there is evidence of further decline in effective protection for all products in the last decade.

Taking all factors into account, we have concluded that in the United Kingdom, at least, restoration of protection would be achieved by a supplementary certificate of the sort proposed by the Commission but having the effect that industry would be able to count on 13 years protected life subject to a maximum extension of five years. These figures would be more in line with United States and Japanese provisions and would prevent further erosion of the present effective patent term.

Finally we think there may be a case for reducing the period of supplementary protection if the proprietor has not been diligent in obtaining marketing approval. United States law contains such a provision.

WALES

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the cost of implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: It is estimated that the cost of implementation would be less than £2 million. It has been decided, as in the rest of Great Britain, not to implement these sections, but the situation will be reviewed carefully when the impact can be assessed of the wider reforms set out in the White Paper "Caring for People: Community Care in the Next Decade and Beyond"—Cm. 849.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what will be the impact in Wales of the £140 reduction in community charge on the eligibility to claim housing benefit.

Mr. David Hunt: Community charge payers throughout Wales will benefit directly from the £62 million we have made available under the community charge reduction scheme and from the additional £300 million we have secured for the general reduction scheme which was announced on 19 March. The overall effect of these schemes, taken together with the realistic local government finance settlement we have made for 1991-92, is that the average charge payable in Wales will be no more than £95 before taking into account eligibility for community charge benefit. Eligibility to claim housing benefit is not affected by these arrangements.

Community Charge

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the community charge payments that will be demanded in every ward in Newport, West and East, incorporating recent changes including transitional relief and community council rates.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is given in the table:

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the total relief provided by the provisions of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Bill to those charge payers paying the standard charge in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Out of the total relief of about £300 million, standard charge payers will receive around £9 million.

Cancelled Operations

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to the answer of 7 March, Official Report, column 236, on cancelled operations, when he will write to the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I sent dated 12 April, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Press Releases

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many press releases have been issued by his Department each year for the past five years ended December 1990.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department issued press releases for the Welsh Office and on behalf of other Government Departments as follows:

Local Authority Child Care

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many children in Wales were received into local authority care where the specific cause was family homelessness, in every year since 1979 until the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The number of children received into care in Wales for the years ending 31 March 1979 to 31 March 1990, where the specific cause was that their family was homeless, is given in the following table:

Research and Development

I shall continue to attach importance to the encouragement of research and development in Wales.

Community Councils

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy in respect of the minimum number of years for which a community council in Wales should have been established before he is prepared to grant permission for its dissolution.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett [holding answer 28 March 1991]: I shall consider any request for permission for the making of a community application for the dissolution of a community council in the light of all relevant circumstances.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the names of community councils in Wales of which he has been notified regarding their dissolution.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett [holding answer 28 March 1991]: I have received copies of orders dissolving Vaynor and Rhoose community councils.

Staffing figures are based on staff in post 1 October 1990. Many other areas are under consideration.

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list in the Official Report, when each of the "next steps" agencies so far established will produce a report showing its results compared with the performance criteria laid down in its framework document.

Mr. Renton: Agencies will publish their annual reports and accounts as soon as possible after the end of the financial year. Those reports will include information on achievement of key performance targets.

Pay and Conditions

43. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met civil service trade union representatives about pay and conditions of service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I meet civil service trade union representatives from time to time to discuss a variety of issues.

Agencies

44. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what consideration he has given to putting out agencies to private management.

Mr. Renton: Ministers continue to keep under review the basis on which Government services are provided. The feasibility of immediate privatisation has been considered and rejected in the case of all agencies created so far. It cannot be ruled out, however, that after a period of years agencies, like other Government activities, may be suitable for privatisation.

EC Nationals

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he plans to make changes to the legislation which governs the employment in the civil service of nationals of other member states of the European Community.

Mr. Renton [pursuant to his reply, 20 December 1990, c. 295]: I have today laid before Parliament, a draft Order in Council which, subject to approval by a resolution of each House of Parliament, will allow nationals of other member states of the European Community and certain members of their families to be employed in the civil service, in posts other than those posts which are part of the public service within the meaning of article 48(4) of the EEC treaty. The Order in Council makes similar provision in relation to the Northern Ireland civil service, thus ensuring that the same position is achieved in the whole of the United Kingdom.

PRIME MINISTER

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what representations Her Majesty's Government have received from international doctors about disease in Iraq.

The Prime Minister: We have received a number of reports about conditions in Iraq, notably that of United Nations Under Secretary-General Ahtisaari. We have announced a pledge of £20 million to be spent partly bilaterally and multilaterally to alleviate the human tragedy provoked by Saddam Hussein. We are also funding daily airlifts to the refugees at a cost of £1 million per week. These contributions are in addition to earlier substantial pledges to the International Committee of the Red Cross and United Nation agencies' appeals.

Chile

Mr. Wray: To ask the Prime Minister if, during the official visit of the President of Chile, the Government will offer improved terms of trade for Chilean exports, and increased transfer of technology and financial support for his programmes.

The Prime Minister: Chile will benefit from any market access concessions negotiated with the European Community during the GATT round. We increased our bilateral technical co-operation funds for Chile following the accession of President Aylwin's Government and are presently discussing a number of projects.

President Aylwin's visit will lead to closer links between Britain and Chile. I was able to pay tribute to the President's achievement in restoring and consolidating democracy.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister whether he is prepared to use nuclear weapons first in response to a conventional attack.

The Prime Minister: The 1990 NATO London declaration made clear that, while NATO will never in any circumstances be the first to use force, nuclear weapons will continue to fulfil an essential role in the overall strategy of the alliance to prevent war by ensuring that there are no circumstances in which nuclear retaliation in response to military action might be discounted.

Migrant Workers

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards ratification of the new international convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom does not intend to ratify the convention on the protection of migrant workers and their families.

Vehicle Theft

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will set up a joint working party of the Home Office and Department of Transport to investigate the possibility of designing cars to be more resistant to theft.

The Prime Minister: The Home Office and Department of Transport have investigated ways in which the security of cars could be improved and discussions are in progress between these Departments, and with the motor manufacturers, on how best their findings and recommendations may be implemented. Home Office crime prevention publicity, particularly during crime prevention week this week, aims to increase awareness of the need for effective car security measures. My right Friend the Home Secretary published today a car theft index which allows owners to see which models are particularly subject to theft.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Imported Vegetables

Mr. Speller: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list those vegetables of temperate country origin whose importers represent more than 25 per cent. of United Kingdom consumption, together with values and percentages of importers as a proportion of domestic production;

(2) if he will list the value of lettuce, tomatoes, cucumbers, spring onions and radishes (a) imported into and (b) produced in the United Kingdom in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what is (a) as a percentage of (b).

Mr. Curry: The requested information is as follows:

	Imports		Output		Imports (tonnage) as a percentage of
	'000 tonnes	Value	'000 tonnes	Value	Home consumption	Output
Vegetable		(£ million)		(£ million)	Per cent.	Per cent.

Tomatoes	272·5	154·6	141·0	68·7	67	193

Notes:

i. Separate data are not available for radishes.

ii. The Channel Islands are treated as part of the United Kingdom for the purposes of overseas trade statistics but are not covered within the output figures.

iii. Estimates of output (production less on-farm waste) have been quoted as being the more comparable with imports.

iv. Peas and beans include dried peas and beans for human consumption.

Farm and Conservation Grants

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farmers he expects to benefit from his plan to drop the requirement that farmers applying for grants under the farm and conservation grants scheme must receive acknowledgment of their prior notification form before incurring costs on farm waste and traditional buildings projects.

Mr. Curry: All applicants for these grants would benefit from the simplified application procedures. A number of farmers who had previously been turned down for grant would also be in a position to re-apply when the rules are changed, but exact figures could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy that his working group reviewing the environmental impact of hill livestock compensatory allowances should meet in public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: We are still considering whether existing environmental benefits afforded by HLCAs should be made more specific. We propose to consult all interested parties in due course.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will write to all local authorities requesting them to increase monitoring for BSE in slaughterhouses and livestock markets.

Mr. Gummer: No. The Government already have a fully effective system in place.

Milk

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest estimate of milk output in the EC and the level of consumption of milk and dairy products within the EC.

Mr. Curry: Dairy cows' milk production in the EC in 1990 was 109,102,800 tonnes—provisional figure. Consumption of milk and the major dairy products was as follows:

Liquid milk and fresh products	—	31,051·0	31,237·5
Butter	—	1,468·5	1,420·5
Cheese	—	4,621·9	4,719·9
Skimmed milk powder and buttermilk powder (including for animal feed)	1,130	—	—

Sugar

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest estimate of sugar consumption and sugar production within the EC.

Mr. Curry: The EC Commission's latest preliminary forecast for the year ending 30 September 1991 put production from sugar grown within the Community at 15·9 million tonnes. Additionally, the Community is forecast to import some 1·5 million tonnes from African, Caribbean and Pacific and other countries, most of which is raw sugar for refining. EC consumption of sugar from all sources is estimated at 11·8 million tonnes.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Education Service (Statistics)

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will supply for each local education authority information on (a) the total revenue expenditure of the relevant council on all services, (b) the total revenue expenditure on all education services, (c) the total revenue expenditure on further education and sixth form colleges, (d) the percentage of item (a) represented by items (b) and (c), (e) the total capital expenditure of the relevant council on all services, (f) the total capital expenditure on all education services, (g) the total capital expenditure on further education and sixth form colleges, (h) the percentage of item (e) represented by items (f) and (g), (i) the total number of, whole-time equivalent, employees of the relevant councils, (j) the total number of whole-time employees engaged in providing the education services and (k) the total number of equivalent employees working in further education and sixth form colleges, and (l) the percentage of item (i) represented by items (j) and (k).

Mr. Fallon: The readily available information is shown in the tables. The financial information is taken from authorities' spending returns and is for 1988-89, the latest year for which data are available. The information on numbers of employees is as collected by the joint staffing watch, and is for March 1990.

Information on further education and sixth form colleges is not collected on a comparable basis. Authorities' spending returns do not separate expenditure on sixth form colleges from that on other secondary schools. Information returned on further education colleges does not separately identify those institutions which subsequently transferred to the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council.

Erasmus Programme

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many United Kingdom students have received awards under the Erasmus programme; and if he will list in rank order the number of students from each United Kingdom institution of higher education whose period of study in another EC country has been funded under the Erasmus programme.

Mr. Alan Howarth: We expect, by the end of the 1990-91 academic year, some 10,500 United Kingdom students to have received student mobility support under the Erasmus programme. The listing of individual institutions has been placed in the Library.

Expenditure (South Yorkshire)

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average cost of educating (a) a primary school pupil and (b) a secondary school pupil in the local education authorities within South Yorkshire.

Mr. Fallon: In 1988-89, the latest year for which information is available, the school-based expenditure per nursery and primary pupil and per secondary pupil derived from information returned by the authorities was as shown in the table. Figures for nursery schools and for primary schools are not collected separately.

University Salaries

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met representatives of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals; and whether he is willing to agree to their request for additional funds for university pay.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. and learned Friend last met representatives of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals on 4 February 1991. It is for the employers and the Association of University Teachers to draw up a pay settlement within the resources available.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out the total pay bill in 1990 prices for university (a) support staff and (b) teachers in each year from 1985 to 1990, and express the overall pay bill as a percentage of the total universities' general recurrent expenditure in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information requested is available only to 1988-89 and is given in the table.

			£ million (1990-91 prices)
Academic-academic related staff	1,170·3	1,218·9	1,255·0	1,262·1
Other staff	530·3	532·0	522·6	521·6
Total as a percentage of United Kingdom universities' total recurrent expenditure from general funds	66·8	67·9	67·3	66·2

Note:
1990-91 prices are derived using GDP deflator assumptions based on the university academic year.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will fund a survey to compare the pay of university technicians with people in similar jobs in the private and public sectors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: No. This is a matter for the employers to consider and fund if it is deemed necessary.

Geography

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the differences between the programmes of study for geography in the documents referred to in his answer of 25 March, Official Report, column 277, and the recommendations of the National Curriculum Council's consultative report; what priority he gives to work on issue-based topics and inquiry-based learning in geography; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The differences are clear from a comparison of the documents. There is no prescription as to the teaching methods to be used in geography, so that issues-based approaches may, if teachers so decide, be used to deliver the statutory requirements. An inquiry approach is required to form an important part of children's work in geography.

European Space Agency

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom contribution to the European Space Agency's Hipparcos project.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The United Kingdom contributes to the ESA Hipparcos project through its subscription to the mandatory science programme of the European Space Agency. As a member of an international consortium, the United Kingdom also supports the analysis of data received from the satellite.

Truancy

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he proposes to take to reduce truancy rates in schools.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales have today issued for consultation a draft circular on school attendance together with draft regulations about pupil registration and the publication of information about rates of attendance.

Truancy needs to be tackled vigorously to ensure that the national curriculum and other educational reforms benefit all pupils. Governors, parents and prospective parents need to have the facts on school attendance. My right hon. Friends therefore propose that schools should be required to publish annually the rates of unauthorised absence for each year group, for each term of the preceding school year.

We expect schools to give the highest priority to maximising rates of attendance, and to work with parents, local education authorities and others to achieve that objective.

Local education authorities and other appropriate educational bodies have been invited to comment on the proposals with a view to regulations being made in the summer.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

South Africa

Mr. Cabora: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action the Government have taken to secure the release of South African political prisoners since August 1990.

Mrs. Chalker: We have repeatedly called on the South African Government to free all political prisoners. We welcome the fact that over 300 political prisoners have been released since February 1990.

Mr. Cabora: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the action taken by Her Majesty's Government to secure the implementation of the United Nations declaration on South Africa adopted at the 16th special session of the General Assembly.

Mrs. Chalker: We continue to encourage all sides in South Africa to maintain progress towards the broad aims set out in the United Nations declaration.

Mr. Cabora: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government have made to the South African Government concerning the immunity from prosecution of political exiles returning to South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: We have urged the South African Government to reach agreement with the parties concerned on sensible arrangements for the return of political exiles to South Africa.

Mr. Cabora: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what representations the Government have made to the South African Government concerning the implementation of section B, clause 8c, of the United Nations declaration on South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: We maintain regular contacts with all sides in South Africa. We have expressed to them the hope that full constitutional negotiations towards a non-racial, democratic society may begin as soon as possible. It is for the parties to those negotiations to decide how the new constitution should be drawn up and adopted.

Mr. Cabora: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government have made to the South African Government on the Internal Security Act.

Mrs. Chalker: We have often stressed to the South African Government the need to repeal those legislative provisions, such as detention without trial, which are contrary to international norms of human rights. The South African Government are currently conducting a review of all such legislation, including the Internal Security Act.

International Fund for Agricultural Development

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the level of funds available to the International Fund for Agricultural Development.

Mrs. Chalker: Some $567 million has been pledged by OECD, OPEC and developing countries to the third replenishment of the International Fund for Agricultural Development. Negotiations on the replenishment were completed in mid-1989, but it became effective only last December. Together with estimated income from loan repayments, investments and other sources. IFAD should have resources totalling in excess of $1,200 million for commitment over the next three years.

IFAD's special programme for Africa, which attained the $300 million target set in 1986 with voluntary contributions from OECD countries, will be fully committed early this year. IFAD's governing council in May will be invited to consider proposals for extending the programme for a further, and final, phase.

Sudan

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on Britain's humanitarian assistance to Sudan.

Mrs. Chalker: We continue to provide substantial humanitarian assistance to Sudan. On 2 April I approved a new package of food and other emergency assistance worth £5·5 million. I am today announcing provision of a further 5,000 tonnes of food aid at an estimated cost of £1·7 million. This brings the total of our response to the present emergency to £17·4 million, which includes 55,550 tonnes of food aid, and to nearly £39 million since the beginning of 1989. I expect to provide more aid as the year goes on.

ENERGY

Immingham Port

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will request the Director General of OFFER to undertake a review of the involvement of National Power and PowerGen in the financing and operation of the port development at Immingham, with respect to the policy of securing economic supply of electricity by means of competition between generators.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No. These are commercial matters for the companies concerned.

British Gas

Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to British Gas and the environment to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Moynihan: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 22 to 26 July.

ENVIRONMENT

Community Charge

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what he estimates will be the yield of the community charge in England in 1991-92 allowing for the effect of the community charge reduction schemes.

Mr. Portillo: The community charge is expected to yield about £7·4 billion in England in 1991-92. About £1 billion of this will be met by community charge benefit.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he will take to ensure that the £140 reduction of community charge announced on 19 March does not lead to any reduction in the benefits previously provided for those people entitled to rebates.

Mr. Key: All headline community charges for 1991-92 will be reduced by £140 as a result of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Bill. The amount of community charge benefit received by charge payers will be lower as a result, but all charge payers, including those on benefit, should have reduced bills.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would have been the community charge in the London boroughs of (a) Wandsworth and (b) Westminster had they received in 1990-91 Government grants per head of relevant population of £448.

Mr. Key: Since 1 April 1990, in contrast to previous arrangements, revenue support grant has been paid to the receiving authority for each area in support jointly of its own expenditure and that of the precepting authorities in the area. For this reason it is inappropriate to attempt to estimate the community charge that Wandsworth and Westminster would have set had they received in 1990-91 Government grants per head of relevant population of £448.

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the proposed spending of £4·3 billion on the poll tax is additional to transitional relief grant and rebate subsidy.

Mr. Key [holding answer 28 March 1991]: The figure of £4·3 billion represents broadly the switch from local to central taxation. It is estimated that the gross cost of community charge grant will be some £5·6 billion in Great Britain. Because many people are already getting extensive help with paying their charges at the levels set by authorities the general reduction will result in savings of some £1·3 billion on reduction scheme grant and benefit subsidy.

Jet Skis

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the powers the exercise of which is monitored by his Department which are currently available to local authorities and others to control nuisances caused by operators of waterborne jet ski machines.

Mr. Baldry: Local authorities can make byelaws under section 76 of the Public Health Act 1961 requiring engines of all seaside pleasure boats, including water ski vessels and ski-mobiles, to be fitted with silencers. Local authorities can also serve an abatement notice on a person responsible for a statutory nuisance, including noise, under section 80 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. An individual aggrieved by noise can apply direct to a magistrates court to make an abatement order where a statutory nuisance occurs or is likely to recur, under section 82 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. The Department keeps no statistics about the control of nuisance caused by operators of waterborne jet ski machines.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those Acts passed by Parliament since 1979 concerning (a) local government finance and (b) local authority duties, powers and responsibilities for authorities in England.

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend the then Minister for Local Government and the Inner Cities gave a list on 4 May 1990 of 124 public general Acts of Parliament, passed between June 1970 and November 1989, which affected local authorities in England, distinguishing those which concern, at least in part, local government finance, Official Report, Vol. 171, column 676. Since November 1989, public general Acts which affect local government in England include:

Aviation and Maritime Security Act 1990
Broadcasting Act 1990
Education (Student Loans) Act 1990
Entertainments (Increased Penalties) Act 1990
Environmental Protection Act 1990
Food Safety Act 1990
National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990
Pensions (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1990
Planning (Consequential Provisions) Act 1990[1]
Planning (Hazardous Substances) Act 1990[1]
Planning (Listed Buildings & Conservation Areas) Act 1990[1]
Representation of the People Act 1990
Rights of Way Act 1990
Town and Country Planning Act 1990[1]
Caravans (Standard Community Charge and Rating) Act 1991[2]
Community Charges (General Reduction) Act 1991[2]
Community Charges (Substitute Setting) Act 1991[2]

[1] Consolidation Act.
[2] Concerns local government finance.

Not all these Acts resulted from Government Bills.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will allow local authorities to spend all their capital receipts.

Mr. Key: Local authorities are able to spend the usable part of their capital receipts on new capital expenditure or on the repayment of their debt. They also retain use of the reserved part of their receipts to repay debt or to finance capital expenditure covered by a credit approval; meanwhile, the funds may be invested in approved investments.

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the level of Government grant per head of the population for 1990-91 and 1991-92 in the London boroughs of (a) Haringey, (b) Barnet and (c) Enfield.

Mr. Key: The available information is as follows:

Government grants in 1990-91, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, per head of relevant population are £762 in Haringey, £366 in Barnet and £475 in Enfield.

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, following the fixing of the community charge in all Leicestershire district councils, he will now update the two answers given by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton on 4 March, Official Report, columns 47-48.

Mr. Key [holding answer 26 March 1991]: Following the statement on 19 March 1991 by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Official Report, vol. 188, column 180-81, £140 will be cut from the current headline community charges for 1991-92. The calculation of community charge reductions and benefits will be made after this general reduction. In addition, my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities announced on 25 March that under the community charge reduction scheme the threshold amount which charge payers are expected to meet from their own resources will be lowered from £104 to £52. The revised figures in the table show the reductions payable to couples in Charnwood, Melton and Rutland who, on 31 March 1991, are living in properties of (a) three quarters average rateable value and (b) half average rateable value for the area.

Vacant Land

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how he has established the level of vacant land areas within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Yeo: The Department has commissioned a national sample survey of the stock of vacant land in urban areas in England. Final estimates from the survey are not yet available. The broad figure of up to 150,000 acres of vacant land given in the consultation paper, "Encouraging the use of vacant public sector land", relates to urban areas in England alone and was based on preliminary work carried out in preparation for the national survey.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the impact the disposal of vacant land areas will have on the green belt.

Mr. Yeo: There is a general presumption against inappropriate development in the green belts. The Government's policy for them is set out in Planning Policy Guidance Note 2. Development of suitable vacant land within urban areas can help to reduce the pressure for development of green field sites.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what steps he intends to take to ensure full public consultation takes place when land areas, currently of recreational value to local people, are indentified as unused or underused and available for disposal;

(2) what is his policy on retaining open spaces in urban areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Land used as public open space or for recreation is not at present entered on registers and is therefore not subject to my right hon. Friend's power to direct disposal. My Department's consultation paper, "Encouraging the use of vacant public sector land", noted that we envisage further public consultation on the criteria for entry on registers under any new statutory arrangement covering all public sector owners.

The issue of retaining open spaces in urban areas has been addressed in my Department's draft planning policy guidance note on sport and recreation which was issued for public consultation in October last year. In the light of the many responses received, my right hon. Friend will be considering carefully what advice should be included in the final guidance.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to enter into a partnership with local government in order to develop vacant land areas in both the public and private sector, for the benefit of and in full consultation with local people.

Mr. Yeo: The Government have already taken various steps to encourage the bringing into use of vacant land, for example, through grant arrangements which apply to land in public or private ownership and through land registers which record public sector land. I am considering what further action is necessary.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what safeguards he is considering in order to avoid vacant land areas being disposed of at a time when land prices are very low.

Mr. Yeo: The timing of disposal is normally a matter for the owner. A public sector owner should get a proper price for his land and my right hon. Friend would for that reason be hesitant about directing disposal when the general level of the market was depressed in the short term.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how a system of incentives for franchisees of vacant land areas will be financed; and what level of incentives budget is envisaged in the first year of operation;

(2) how defined areas of vacant public land will be established; and how large such areas are expected to be;

(3) what progress has been made with the selection of two experimental areas for the proposals outlined in the consultation paper "Encouraging the use of vacant public sector land"; and if he will make a statement;

(4) how he intends to define the terms "underused" and "unused" when identifying vacant land areas;

(5) how vacant land areas, which ought to be on new underused/unused land registers, will be identified.

Mr. Yeo: We are considering in the light of responses to the consultation paper what further action might be taken to encourage the bringing into use of vacant sector land. Our conclusions will be announced in due course. Meanwhile no decisions have been taken on whether to proceed with the proposals for experimental franchises or for giving all public sector owners a statutory obligation to maintain and publicise registers. The consultation paper noted that the criteria for entry on such registers and for eligibility for directions to dispose would be the subject of further consultation.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to introduce proposals to identify and dispose of vacant land areas in the ownership of central Government Departments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) on 19 February, Official Report, columns 114-15. Individual Departments have been asked to maintain and publicise registers of their vacant land holdings and proposals to make this a statutory obligation were included in the Department's consultation paper.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to introduce proposals to identify and dispose of vacant land areas in private sector ownership; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: In the light of responses made to the Department's consultation paper our review will include the question of whether any measures are appropriate to encourage the bringing into use of vacant land in private sector ownership or whether, as implied in the consultation paper, its subjection to the normal incentives and disciplines of the market is sufficient.

Public Sector Land

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the occasions when existing powers have been exercised to direct disposal of public sector land.

Mr. Yeo: The following list shows the sites in respect of which directions under section 98 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 have been issued together with the owners concerned:

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has available concerning the impact of proposals for the disposal of public sector land on land areas identified by local authorities for future housing purposes.

Mr. Yeo: The use of any land which my right hon. Friend decided to make the subject of a direction to dispose would be decided through the planning system in the normal way. Where a direction to dispose is proposed the landowner has the right to make representations about its actual or intended use. My right hon. Friend takes these into account when deciding whether to make the direction.

Environmental Assessments

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to make the 1985 European Community directive on environmental assessment applicable to development proposals for which consent is sought by means of private parliamentary Bills.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) on 26 February, column 422. As the consultation paper issued by my Department and the Welsh Office on that date stated, it is proposed that the amendments to procedures to require environmental assessment, where appropriate, for private Bills for the construction of works should apply to Bills deposited in and after the 1991-92 Session. A proposed amendment to Standing Orders was tabled on 6 March.

Urban Programme

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will break down the number of projects not approved for the 1991-92 financial year (a) numerically and (b) by cash value for the urban programme in (i) Barnsley, (ii) Blackburn, (iii) Bolton, (iv) Bradford, (v) Brent and (vi) Bristol; and if he will indicate the percentage of projects not approved for the financial year 1991-92 relating to (1) ethnic minority projects, (2) projects relating to disability, (3) economic developments and (4) the environment.

Mr. Portillo: The information is provided in the table.

London City Airport

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to make his decision on the future of the City of London airport in the light of his inspector's report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: When I have received and considered the inspector's report.

Housing, Liverpool

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homes have been improved in Liverpool with the aid of Government grants, over each of the past 11 years; how many new homes have been built by the local authority and by housing associations in each of the past 11 years; and how many homes in the public and private sector are currently vacant in Liverpool.

Mr. Yeo: The numbers of grants paid to private owners and tenants and the numbers of housing association and local authority dwellings improved with the aid of grant or subsidy reported quarterly by Liverpool city council are published in "Local Housing Statistics".

The numbers of new homes built, based on monthly returns, appear in the publication "Housebuilding in England by Local Authority Areas 1980 to 1989" (tables 1.1 to 1.10). Figures for the first nine months of 1990 are in "Local Housing Statistics" (issue 96, table 1).

The tables indicate where the information is incomplete because all returns for the year have not been received.

The latest available information on vacant dwellings relates to 1 April 1990 and was provided by Liverpool city council in its April 1990 housing investment programme return (HIP1).

Copies of all these documents are in the Library.

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals against the uniform business rate have been lodged in the areas covering the parliamentary constituencies of (a) Hornsey and Wood Green and (b) Tottenham.

Mr. Key: By 5 April 1991, the valuation office had received 1,368 proposals to alter the 1990 rating list in respect of the parliamentary constituency area of Hornsey and Wood Green and 1,062 in respect of that for Tottenham.

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to increase the staffing of the North Yorkshire valuation and community charge tribunal, in order that appeals concerning the uniform business rate may be heard within six months of their submission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Ratepayers had six months from 1 April 1990 in which to make proposals to alter their 1990 rating assessments and valuation officers then had a further six months to settle the proposal before the matter became an appeal. Most proposals have only recently become appeals to the tribunals. The North Yorkshire valuation and community charge tribunal has 9,800 appeals outstanding. Staffing and other administrative arrangements of tribunals have been improved to enable the caseload to be dealt with, and staffing levels are being further reviewed. Tribunals will generally give priority to hardship cases and to the more significant appeals, with a view to establishing quickly benchmarks which should allow settlements pag p 31between valuation officers and ratepayers without the need in all cases for a tribunal hearing. Complex cases may take longer and it would not necessarily be in the ratepayers' best interests for these to be rushed.

Public Buildings (Safety)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will change the standards relating to the physical structures of public buildings to make them safer in the event of attacks by terrorists.

Mr. Yeo: Various measures are being taken to improve the safety of public buildings in view of recent terrorist attacks. It would not be appropriate to give details of these measures.

Prestwich Hospital

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to come to a decision on the planning applications from Salford health authority relating to part of the Prestwich hospital, Salford site.

Mr. Yeo: The appeal will be determined as quickly as possible after the inspector has reported on the public inquiry to be held on 26 September.

Local Authority Swap Contracts

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to deal with the problem arising from local authority swap contracts.

Mr. Key: The Government are considering the implications of the House of Lords judgment on this complex matter and will make an announcement as soon as possible.

Heliports (London)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he received the inspector's report on the City of London heliport planning application; and what the inspector recommends.

Mr. Yeo: The inspector's report has not yet been received.

Lambeth (Housing)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total amount of bids for housing association development in Lambeth for 1991-92; and what bids will be met for new housing and rehabilitation of existing housing.

Mr. Yeo: This is a matter for the Housing Corporation. I have therefore asked the corporation to respond to the hon. Member direct.

Bees

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to prevent damage to domestic bees as a consequence of the importation of the varroa mite.

Mr. Curry: Our aim is to keep this country free from varroasis. The Importation of Bees Order 1980 prohibits imports of honey bees except under licence from countries of high bee health status which are free from varroasis.

Parking Offences

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many parking tickets were received and paid by his Department in each year since 1988 in respect of official vehicles.

Mr. Hesseltine [holding answer 28 March 1991]: The numbers of parking tickets received and paid by the Department of the Environment in respect of the Government car service, the interdepartmental despatch service and DOE (Central) Vehicles, for each of the years requested, are:

1988-89	1989-90	[1] 1990

[1] To date.

These numbers exclude PSA and TCS vehicles for which records are not held centrally and where the information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Tameside

92. Mr Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he intends to take to increase infrastructure investment in Tameside.

Mr. Key [holding answer 22 February 1991]: Responsibility for monitoring and developing infrastructure in Tameside lies primarily with the borough council. My Department has this year awarded Tameside rolling programme status for derelict land reclamation grant together with supplementary credit approvals for environmental and other regenerative schemes in the Hyde renewal area.

Tameside is also eligible for grant aid from the European regional development fund under phase II of the Mersey basin programme, which is administered by the Government for the EC in partnership with local authorities and other eligible bodies. Tameside have submitted 25 grant applications for a range of infrastructure projects; and so far the first three of these have been approved, to a total of £110,657 grant aid. Others are expected to follow.

Grimsargh Hall Farm

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in respect of the proposed development by J. Turner and Son at Grimsargh Hall farm, Preston; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 8 March 1991]: Two letters of objection were received by my right hon. Friend and Preston borough council copied to him a further 11 and one in support.

My right hon. Friend considered that the issues raised did not justify calling in the application and he has authorised the council to determine it as it thinks fit.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had relating to its assessments of the ecological resources of the Gulf states from the world conservation monitoring centre in Cambridge.

Mr. Baldry: In addition to the hon. Member's question to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 22 March, Official Report, Volume 188, column 246, I have also received a letter from the World Conservation Monitoring Centre which draws attention to the work carried out by the centre on the Gulf conflict.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what protection has been given to sea grasses in the Gulf.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 22 March 1991, Official Report, Vol. 188, column 245.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 245, in what ways he has made the work of the Plymouth marine laboratory of NERC known to the Gulf states.

Mr. Baldry: The report on the likely biological effects of the Gulf oil slick carried out by the Natural Environment Research Council was sent to relevant agencies in Saudi Arabia via the British embassy in Riyadh in early February, and to British embassies in other Gulf states.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make a statement on the information learned from the work of the Meteorological Office research aircraft in the Gulf;

(2) what information he has had from members of the Meteorological Office, in relation to sulphur dioxide and other deleterious substances, as a result of their research flight over Kuwait; and what further monitoring action he proposes to take.

Mr. Baldry: I am arranging to place in the Library copies of an assessment by Departments concerned of the potential impact of the burning oil wells in Kuwait on the environment and human health; and of a report by the Meteorological Office on the recent activities of the meteorological research flight in the region. Following analysis of the data gathered by the aircraft, the Meteorological Office will publish a preliminary report of the findings in a few weeks' time. No further monitoring action is currently planned.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what satellite images of the effect of the pollution over Kuwait have been made available by other countries to his Department.

Mr. Baldry: Meteorological satellite images provide information on the location and extent of the smoke plume in the Gulf rather than on its effects. Images from European meteorological satellites are available to all nations through normal receiving channels.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assistance his Department is providing to the Kuwait Government to help them to cope with the effect of summer ventilation systems in Kuwait inhaling air with abnormal sulphur dioxide and nitrogen content.

Mr. Baldry: None at present. My Department continues to be in contact with the Gulf states about whether there is further scope for the application of United Kingdom expertise in the evaluation of the environmental effects of the war and possible remedial action.

Estuaries (Effluent)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a study of the effluent from waste production and waste disposal in relation to the ecosystems of estuaries.

Mr. Baldry: It is already normal practice to set discharge consents for effluents to rivers and estuaries on the basis of quality objectives set for downstream waters. The quality objectives used for estuaries are to maintain the ecosystems if the quality is high, and to restore the quality if it is not. With the introduction of integrated pollution control discharges from prescribed processes will also be required to apply best available techniques not entailing excessive cost to prevent pollution.

Hazardous Waste (US Bases)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions have taken place between the Government and United States Government about disposal of hazardous waste from United States bases in the United Kingdom and elsewhere in the world; and what was the outcome of the discussions.

Mr. Baldry: Discussions have been held since November 1989 with the United States Government about the importation into the United Kingdom of hazardous waste from United States bases overseas. Pending the outcome of these discussions imports of hazardous waste into United States bases have been suspended. The United States Government have now agreed that their forces will not in the future import hazardous waste directly into their bases in the United Kingdom. Discussions are continuing with the United States Government with a view to stopping the importation of all waste.

Training Courses (London)

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those providers of employment training courses, in the London area, who have had their funding cut in the current financial year.

Mr. Jackson: The contracts for employment training are negotiated between training providers and training and enterprise councils, where operational, or otherwise with area offices of the Employment Department. In either case the financial details of these contracts are commercial in confidence.

Local Authority Staff (Strikes)

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which local authorities employees have taken strike action during the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 27 March 1991]: Confidentiality constraints preclude the publication of information which directly or indirectly identifies individual employers or people involved in strike action, even when such information may already be available in the public domain, for example, from media reports.

HEALTH

Children

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to ensure that there are no more cases of children being removed from their homes by social workers in unjustifiable circumstances.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Children Act, which will be implemented on 14 October, recasts the law on protecting children at risk to ensure that, when necessary, effective protective action can be taken within a framework of proper safeguards and reasonable opportunities for parents and others connected with the child to challenge such actions before a court.

The emergency protection order replaces the criticised place of safety order. Before granting such an order the court has to be satisfied the child is likely to suffer significant harm or cannot be seen in circumstances where the child might be suffering significant harm. The order has a maximum duration of eight days with a possible single extension of seven days. Where parents or certain other persons were not present when the emergency protection order was made they will have a right after 72 hours to apply to have the order discharged.

The Children Act introduces a new order, the child assessment order. Its purpose is to enable an assessment of a child to be made where significant harm is suspected but the child is not thought to be at immediate risk, where the local authority or other authorised person considers an assessment is required and where the parents are unwilling to co-operate. The order is intended to allow the local authority, or authorised person, to ascertain enough about the child's health or development or the way in which he has been treated to decide what further action, if any, is required.

These new orders will enable a balance to be struck between the rights of parents to bring up their children as they see fit and the duty of the state to intervene when necessary to safeguard the welfare of a child.

The Act also makes important changes to the use by local authorities of wardship and the High Court's inherent jurisdiction. If a local authority wishes to apply to a court for exercise of the High Court's inherent jurisdiction, it will first have to obtain leave of court to do so. Leave will be granted only if no statutory procedure is available under the Act which would achieve the desired result, and if there is reasonable cause to believe that the child is likely to suffer significant harm if inherent jurisdiction is not exercised.

Speech Therapists

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many speech therapists are currently employed by local health authorities;

(2) if he will list (a) the number of speech therapists and (b) the ratio of speech therapists per 100,000 of population in the regional health authorities' planning proposals for each year from 1989 to 1994.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There were 2,810 speech therapists employed by the national health service in England at 30 September 1989. Details of the ratio of speech therapists per 100,000 of population in the regional health authorities' planning proposals for each year from 1990 to 1994 are not available centrally. The ratio as at 30 September 1989, by English region is shown in the table.

Abortions

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of national health service abortions under 13 weeks since last menstrual period, and the corresponding number of day care operations, performed on women resident in each regional health authority, and in each district health authority, in England and Wales in the latest available year.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

General Practitioners, Haringey

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those general practitioner practices in the Haringey health authority area intending to hold their own budget as from April in the current year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Tim Chessells, chairman of the North East Thames regional health authority, for details.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to place the Audit Commission's annual financial audit of each district health authority in the public domain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Audit Commission's certificate on each district health authority's accounts is published with the accounts and will include any qualifications which the commission has found it necessary to make. In addition, the commission will make public reports "in the public interest" where particularly significant issues arise. Beyond this, its reports are properly directed to the authority itself.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the current waiting list for each specialty in the Haringey health authority and the number of people who have waited (a) for over one year and (b) for over two years, in each specialty.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The latest available information, at September 1990, is given in the table. It is the time individual patients wait that matters, not total numbers on the list. In the 18 months to September 1990 the number of patients waiting over one year for treatment in Haringey district health authority fell by 51 per cent.

Clinical Regrading

Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received in relation to the time scale of the clinical regrading appeals.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A number of letters on this subject have been received. Appeals against clinical grading decisions are heard under a complicated and time-consuming procedure agreed by the general Whitley council. We know that some nurses are unhappy about the time taken to hear their appeals under this agreement. When the clinical grading structure was negotiated, we offered to discuss a streamlined procedure specifically for clinical grading appeals. The nursing trade unions chose not to pursue this possibility and insisted on retaining the existing complex procedures.

Pharmaceutical Pricing

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to publish his response to the European Community Commission's recent questionnaire on pharmaceutical pricing.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I am arranging for copies of our response to the Commission of the European Communities questionnaire and of the questionnaire itself to be placed in the Library.

The response affirms the Government's wish to promote an open competitive market, and to take a positive part in future Community discussions on cost controls. The Government support discussions and exchanges of information between member states on matters of common interest in pharmaceuticals, including comparisons of prices and qualities of products to encourage rational prescribing, classification and identification systems, pack sizes, and availability of generics. There are considerable differences between member states' health care systems and their arrangements for controlling pharmaceutical expenditure. The Government consider, however, that a prescriptive central approach to price and profit controls should be avoided. Matters to do with the organisation and financing of health care are for member states.

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he is considering any changes to the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We continue to operate the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme under the 1986 agreement with the pharmaceutical industry. The scheme will continue to operate unless either side gives six months' notice of termination not earlier than April 1992. In considering future arrangements, as well as the working of the scheme, we will take account of the effects of any relevant European Community developments on price and profit controls and of the indicative prescribing scheme.

Local Authority Child Care

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children in England were received into local authority care where the specific cause was family homelessness, in every year since 1979 until the last year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The latest available figures are the provisional statistics for the year ending 31 March 1989. The number of children received into voluntary care under section 2 of the Child Care Act in England for the years ending 31 March 1979 to 31 March 1989 where the specific cause was that their family was homeless is given in the table.

Prestwich Hospital

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the patients of Pinfold, Troy and Tottington wards at Prestwich hospital, Salford, will be evacuated, as recommended by the Health Advisory Service/Social Services Inspectorate in its report dated October 1900, No. (90) MI/E e.12.

Mr. Dorrell: I understand that Clifton House at Prestwich hospital, Salford, will close by August 1991. Troy ward will close in May, Pinfold in June and Tottington in July.

Sterilisation

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which district health authorities provide sterilisation within the national health service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information collected centrally is not a form which enables accurate identification of all the district health authorities providing sterilisations.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has conducted any research into links between the availability of sterilisation and incidents of unplanned and regretted pregnancies.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No research on this specific topic has been commissioned by the Department.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the relative costs of (a) sterilisation for social reasons and (b) continued use of contraception within the national health service; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally.

Hospital Beds (Trent Region)

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the numbers of beds available to national health service patients within the Trent regional health authority.

Mr. Dorrell: The table shows the number of average daily available beds by district health authority for the Trent region in 1989-90, and the corresponding number of inpatients treated. The latest available information is as follows:

	Number of Beds 1989-90	Number of Patients treated 1989-90

Hormone Drugs

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a further statement on his Department's survey into the use and misuse of hormone drugs.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on 19 February at column 87. I will write to the hon. Member when further details are available.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) of 22 March, Official Report, column 254, if he will break down the estimated cost of £28 million for implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; if any sums were included in respect of payments to authorised representatives; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is as follows:

	£m
Costs of running a system of authorised representatives under Sections 1 and 2	15
Additional costs incurred during assessment process under Section 3 through use of authorised representatives	3
Costs of responding to increased pressures on service provision as a result of Sections 1-3	10

The cost estimates were based on detailed preparatory work undertaken independently by one metropolitan borough and one shire county. The metropolitan borough assumed that authorised representatives would not receive payments. The shire county assumed that 50 per cent. would be appointed by local authorities and receive fees and expenses, while the other 50 per cent. would be appointed by disabled people themselves and would receive expenses only.

GP Lists (Barnsley)

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects 1990 figures to be available on the average general practitioner list size for the Barnsley family health services authority.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The 1990 figure for the average general practitioner list size for the Barnsley family health services authority should be available by the middle of May.

AIDS

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give a breakdown by recipient organisation of funds made available during the current financial year to organisations specifically concerned with AIDS education; and if he will indicate in each case the purpose for which those funds are intended.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department of Health makes funds available to a range of organisations in both the statutory and voluntary sectors for services connected with AIDS education, care and support.

In 1990-91 £8·5 million was allocated to the Health Education Authority for the development of the national AIDS public education campaign and a further £1·5 million was allocated to fund the running costs of the national AIDS helpline.

In addition, health authorities have been asked to ensure that a substantial part of the earmarked AIDS allocation which totalled £129·5 million in 1990-91, is devoted to the development of local HIV prevention work.

So far as the voluntary sector is concerned, in 1990-91 £1·8 million was provided to AIDS services organisations as follows:

AIDS Ahead	40,000
AIDS Care Education and Training (ACET)	140,000

Positively Women	40,000
Standing Conference on Drug Abuse	41,000

Terrence Higgins Trust	450,000

These sums are intended as a contribution to the core administrative costs of the organisations concerned but not for specific initiatives or specific areas of their work.

Health Authority Members

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements he has made for the declaration of interests which may be thought to be associated with the discharge of their duties by his appointed members of regional and district health authorities; in what way any such interests are made public; and what criteria or code he has published as a guide to the compilation of any such registers.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Provisions relating to declaration of interests are set out in the Regional and District Health Authorities (Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1990—11 (6), 13 and 20—and are covered in guidance issued on 12 July 1990. No specific guidance has been issued on the compilation of registers of interest.

Mental Health Grant

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the local authorities which have indicated that they are not taking up the full amount of the new mental health specific grant.

Mr. Dorrell [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1991 c. 351-54]: I regret that the table published contained errors. The local authorities which have indicated that they are not taking up the full amount of the new mental illness specific grant should read as follows:

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students transferring from primary school to second level education in 1990 were not placed in a school by (a) August, (b) September, (c) October and (d) later than October.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information supplied by the education and library boards indicates that the number of pupils transferring from primary school to secondary level education in 1990 who were not placed in a school by the end of August was 31. All of these pupils were placed in a school by the end of September.

Irish Republican Army

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his reply of 11 December 1990, Official Report, column 365, whether there is any relationship between the official Irish Republican Army and any political party in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: I am not able either to confirm or deny any such relationship.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the cost of implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The cost of implementing sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1989 has not yet been estimated.

Government support was given to the introduction of the Disabled Persons (Northern Ireland) Act on the basis that it would be brought into effect in stages as resources permitted. Sections 9, 10, part of 11 and 12 came into operation on 7 December 1989.

On 1 April 1991, sections 5 and 6 of the Act, and parts of sections 4, 8 and 11, were brought into force. These provisions require health and social services boards to assess the needs of disabled people for certain social welfare services, and the ability of their carers to provide appropriate care. Boards are also required, in association with education and library boards, to ensure that young disabled people have a smooth transition from full-time education to adult life. Substantial resources have been made available to boards to enable them to implement these provisions.

With the implementation of these sections of the 1989 Act, Northern Ireland is now fully in line with Great Britain as far as the implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Representation and Consultation) Act 1986 is concerned. The intention is to maintain this position of parity.

Of the provisions of the 1989 Act still to be brought into effect, sections 1 and 2 provide for the appointment of an authorised representative either by the disabled person concerned or by the relevant health and social services board. Section 3 requires the relevant board to give a disabled person or his authorised representative the right to make representations about his need for services, to provide on request a written statement on the assessed need for services and to respond to representations about any such statement.

The implementation of these sections has been overtaken by wider developments in the community care field. The policy paper "People First" which was published last year, sets out the way forward for community care in Northern Ireland in the 1990s. Its wide-ranging proposals reflect and indeed amplify the spirit of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the 1989 Act.

For example, from 1 April 1991 health and social services boards have been required to put in place new complaints procedures which will ensure the formal investigation of all complaints or representations about community care services made by individuals or by anyone on their behalf. From 1 April 1993, comprehensive assessment arrangements will be introduced covering the community care needs of all people who are vulnerable through aging, chronic mental illness, mental handicap or physical disability. A written statement of the result of assessments and the services to be provided under agreed care plans will be provided on request. The Department of Health and Social Services is currently assessing the resources needed to bring these developments fully into effect, and will ensure that boards prepare for their introduction over the intervening two years.

In the light of these initiatives the implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 would be largely unnecessary, as their impact in the main will be achieved through the wider community care reforms. To press ahead with them now would be to run the risk of imposing upon boards complex administrative arrangements which they would have to fund at the expense of services. As in Great Britain, it has therefore been decided not to implement these sections, but the situation will be carefully reviewed when the impact of the wider community care reforms can be assessed.

Value Added Tax

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how he intends to allocate the additional revenue in Northern Ireland from value added tax consequent upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: As indicated by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement, this change arises from a substantial switch from local to central taxation in the United Kingdom as a whole and will result in reduced domestic rates bills in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures he is taking to limit the impact of the rise in value added tax upon citizens in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: In view of the long-standing principle of parity in taxation throughout the United Kingdom, no such measures are necessary or appropriate.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what additional funds he is allocating to local government bodies and area boards following the increase in value added tax.

Dr. Mawhinney: VAT paid by local government bodies and area boards is recoverable and the increase will not therefore affect expenditure.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the reduction in rates by each council in Northern Ireland as a result of the increase in value added tax.

Dr. Mawhinney: The total domestic rate poundage in each district council area will be reduced by an additional 82p. The district rate element remains unchanged but the reduction in the total domestic rate poundage—the domestic regional rate plus the district rate—will be 36 per cent. on average.

11-plus

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students went through the 11-plus transfer procedure in 1990.

Dr. Mawhinney: A total of 25,783 pupils were in the age group to transfer from primary to secondary education in September 1990. A total of 18,126 sat the transfer procedure tests.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students transferring from primary school to second level education in 1990, with an 11-plus examination grade of (i) one, (ii) two, (iii) three and (iv) other, did not get placed in the school of their (a) first choice and (b) first or second choice.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows:

	Grades
	1	2	3	Other
i. pupils who did not obtain a place in the school of first choice	20	693	869	596
ii. pupils who did not obtain a place in the school of first or second choice	2	418	320	233

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students were subject to the appeal tribunal procedure of the 11-plus transfer system in 1990; and in how many cases were appeals (a) allowed and (b) disallowed.

Dr. Mawhinney: The appeal tribunals set up by the education and library boards considered 467 appeals; 249 appeals were successful and 218 were not upheld.

Customs Service

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consideration has been given to creating employment for employees of the Northern Ireland Customs Service who will be surplus to customs requirements after 1992.

Mr. Needham: The Industrial Development Board for Northern Ireland is leading an initiative aimed at attracting Government work from the south-east of England to Northern Ireland and is achieving success. The recent and very welcome decision by HM Customs and Excise to transfer 100 VAT administration jobs from London to Newry will go a long way to providing work for Customs and Excise staff who will become surplus to requirements in 1992. The IDB is continuing its efforts to attract more work from both the public and private sectors in Great Britain.

Roads

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions he has had representations from the Government of the Irish Republic about the closure of border roads.

Dr. Mawhinney: The closure of border roads has been discussed regularly at Anglo-Irish Conferences, and through the Anglo-Irish secretariat.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Income Support

14. Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many low-income pensioners have gained from the extra increases in income support that took effect earlier this month.

Miss Widdecombe: Some 400,000 claimants have gained directly from the extra increase in the basic pensioner premium in income support; well over 1·5 million have gained through housing benefit or community charge benefit. This means that since the beginning of October 1989 there has been a real increase in every one of the pensioner premiums applying to around 6 million people at a total cost of around £300 million.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are receiving income support in the areas covered by the Blyth Valley Department of Social Security office.

Miss Widdecombe: On 28 February 1991 there were 8,326 income support claims at the Department's office in Blyth.

Notes: Data derived from 100 per cent. count of cases in action, which include a number where payment has ceased but other action is continuing. Data are provisional and subject to amendment.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners claim income support in Blyth Valley; and what this is as a percentage of all pensioners.

Miss Widdecombe: On 28 February 1991 there were 2,559 income support claims from pensioners at the Department's office in Blyth. Data are not available on the total pensioner population in Blyth on the date and for the precise geographical area to which the above information relates.

Note: Data derived from 100 per cent. count of cases in action, which include a number where payment has ceased but other action is continuing. Data are provisional and subject to amendment.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many adults in Scotland over the age of 18 years are dependent on income support for their livelihood at the latest date for which figures are available;

(2) how many people are in receipt of income support in Scotland at the latest date for which figures are available.

Miss Widdecombe: In May 1989, the latest date for which information is available, some 565,000 people in Scotland over the age of 18 were wholly or in part dependent on income support. This total comprises 483,000 claimants, 81,000 partners, and fewer than 500 dependants aged 18 or over. This information is drawn from the May 1989 "Annual Statistical Enquiry", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Disabled People

15. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the impact of recent technological developments upon the disabled.

Mr. Scott: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson).

Departmental Staff

16. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he intends to take to increase the availability of staff at DSS offices in response to the increase in applications for benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The staff resource allocation to DSS offices is based on a system which takes account of workload forecasts. The benefit agency monitors these forecasts and the staffing allocation and determines what action is necessary in respect of any changes. Account is taken of both increases and decreases in benefit workloads as some changes can be partly or wholly offset against others.

Sick and Disabled People

17. Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the figure for the average annual increase in spending on long-term sick and disabled people (a) since 1979 and (b) for the period 1974 to 1979.

Mr. Scott: We are currently spending £10·1 billion per year on benefits for long-term sick and disabled people. This represents an annual increase of £470 million per year at 1990-91 prices since 1979, compared with £310 million per year between 1974 and 1979.

19. Sir Bernard Braine: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the most recent figure for the average annual increase in spending on long-term sick and disabled people since 1979; and what were the comparable figures for the period 1974 to 1979.

Mr. Scott: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson).

Pensioners (Incomes)

18. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much pensioners' total incomes would have increased since 1979 if the rate of increase between 1974 and 1979 had continued; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The average net pensioner income increased by only 3 per cent., in real terms, between 1974 and 1979. My hon. Friend will be interested to learn that, had this rate of growth continued, the increase in pensioners' net incomes, in 1987 prices, between 1979 and 1987 would have been a mere £3·80 per week when in fact they rose by £24 during this period.

21. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received regarding the income and related matters of pensioners.

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and Secretary of State recently met delegates from the Pensioners Convention. Ministers have also, in recent months, met representatives of four national pensioner organisations.

Invalid Care Allowance

20. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the earnings disregard in invalid care allowance; and what its value was two years ago.

Mr. Scott: On 8 April the earnings limit for invalid care allowance increased from £20 to £30 a week. In April 1989 the limit was £12.

Claimants

22. Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures he is implementing to improve service to social security claimants.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friends the Members for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) and for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester).

Family Credit

23. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been spent on advertising family credit since September 1989; and by how many the number of recipients has increased.

Mr. Jack: There were 319,000 family credit awards in payment for September 1989. The number then fell every month until the end of the year, when it stood at 298,000. Further advertising from mid-November and subsequently cost a total of £6·1 million. The caseload then rose each month from January 1990 until July when it reached 326,000 and then averaged well over 320,000 throughout the second half of 1990. This is a considerable achievement when viewed against the background of a constantly changing eligible population.

24. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of new claims for family credit was unsuccessful in the last month for which information is available.

Mr. Jack: Some 48·4 per cent. of new family credit claims cleared during March 1991 were unsuccessful. This includes claims which were withdrawn or invalid, as well as those where it was decided that the family was not entitled to benefit.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what level of family credit award is necessary (a) to activate entitlement to other benefits for which entitlement to or receipt of family credit is a condition and (b) prevents the claimant from making a new claim for family credit if her circumstances change during the currency of the award.

Mr. Jack: Entitlement to other benefits, such as the remission of NHS charges and certain payments from the social fund, exists only for families who are in receipt of family credit. Where the amount of family credit entitlement is less than 50p a week it is not payable and therefore in that situation there would be no automatic entitlement to the other benefits.

Family credit is payable for 26 weeks and the rate at which it is payable is not affected by any change of circumstances during that period. Thus, whenever family credit entitlement is 50p a week or more, and therefore payable, no account can be taken of a change of circumstances during the currency of an award.

Low-Income Workers

25. Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures the Government have implemented since 1983 to assist working people on low incomes.

Mr. Jack: Tax and national insurance contribution changes have ensured that working people keep more of their own pay. The reformed benefit system has resulted in a huge reduction in the number of working people who would be better off on benefit, and people no longer find themselves worse off as a result of increasing their earnings.

Occupational Pensions

27. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of the retired population has an occupational pension; and what is the percentage for the most recently retired.

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend will be pleased to hear that, in 1987, 52 per cent. of all pensioners and 73 per cent. of recently retired pensioners received income from occupational pensions.

Pensioners (Benefits)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what further help he will give to people past retirement age who rely on state benefits as their sole source of income.

Miss Widdecombe: As a proportion of all pensioners, the number of people past state pension age living solely on state benefits, including those for disability, fell from 23 per cent. in 1979 to 16 per cent. in 1987. All pensioners' benefits are regularly uprated. In addition, income support and other income-related benefits for elderly people have recently been increased by more than the normal uprating index.

Tax Benefit Withdrawals

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people earn less than the respective point at which the tax benefit withdrawal level falls to 34 per cent.

Mr. Jack: Reliable estimates are not available on the basis requested. Estimates of the number of full-time workers receiving income-related benefits and facing combined income tax and benefit withdrawal rates in excess of 40 per cent. were given to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on 8 March at column 314-15. It is very unlikely that there are any full-time workers facing marginal deduction rates between 34 per cent. and 40 per cent.

One-parent Benefit

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is (a) the weekly benefit entitlement when not working of a single parent with two children aged eight and 12 years and (b) the weekly income of a single parent with two children, also aged eight and 12 years, with earnings of £10, £15, £20, £30, £40 and £50.

Mr. Jack: The information is set out in the table. All assumptions are as set out in the published tax/benefit model tables. The family is assumed to live in council property appropriate to its size and to pay estimated average rent and community charge. Average rents are provisional 1991-92 figures and community charge has been assessed at £250 per annum. Any relevant changes announced in the Budget, including the increase in child benefit which will take effect in October, have also been incorporated. It has been assumed that the earnings of £10 to £30 a week are in respect of part-time work with the family remaining in receipt of income support. This means that the net income will remain static once the earnings disregard of £15·00 a week has been reached.

It should be noted that the results in the tables remain arbitrary. They cannot reflect, except by chance, the actual circumstances of particular people and cannot claim to be representative of the population at large. The tables use hypothetical rents, so do not reflect the full range of housing costs which people can pay.

Mr. Jack: The information is set out in the table.

Mr. Jack: Estimates of the numbers of claimants receiving each of the main benefits for the years 1978-79 to 1990-91 and the percentage increases since 1979 are shown in the tables.

Benefits and Allowances

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the benefit and allowances to which a married man with eight children under 11 years is entitled if his gross weekly earnings are (a) £90, (b) £120 and (c) £180 and he is paying average rent and rates (i) if he is working and (ii) if he is unemployed and showing the total net weekly spending power in each case.

Mr. Jack: The information is set out in the table. All assumptions are as set out in the published tax benefit model tables. Each family is assumed to live in council property appropriate to its size and to pay estimated average rent and community charge. Average rents are provisional 1991-92 figures and community charge has been assessed at £250 per annum. Any relevant changes announced in the Budget, including the increase in child benefit which will take effect in October, have also been incorporated.

It should be noted that the results in the tables remain arbitary. They cannot reflect, except by chance, the actual circumstances of particular people and cannot claim to be representative of the population at large. The tables use hypothetical rents so they do not reflect the full range of housing costs which people can pay.

Note: No rent rebate or Community Charge benefit is payable at these earnings levels. This is due to the high rate of Family Credit.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the total number of supplementary benefit, income support and family support recipients and the total cost for each year since 1979 to the latest date available.

[1] In April 1988 Supplementary Benefit was replaced by Income Support, and Family Income Supplement was replaced by Family Credit.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the central Government expenditure on rent rebates, rent allowances, rate rebates and family credit in 1979 and 1990; and what was the income level at which these benefits cease and the number of persons in receipt of such benefits in each year.

Miss Widdecombe: The information available is in the table. In 1979-80 help with housing costs was provided through the supplementary benefit scheme administered by the Department of Health and Social Security, and the rent and rate rebate and rent allowance schemes which were the responsibility of the Department of the Environment. The costs and numbers getting help with housing costs through supplementary benefit are not readily available. The figures for 1979-80 therefore represent Department of the Environment schemes only.

The expenditure data shown for 1979-80 reflect total local authority spending. This was subsidised at the rate of 90 per cent. The 1990-91 figures are the amount of the central Government grant paid to local authorities through housing benefit subsidy. Direct comparison of the two sets of figures would be misleading because of the limited nature of the information for 1979-80.

The income level at which eligibility to family income supplement/credit and housing/community charge benefit ceases depends on the size of the household. Additionally in the latter two benefits the level of eligible costs affects entitlement. There is therefore no single income level at which entitlement would cease.

[4] From 1990-91, most central Government support for rent rebates appears in the Department of the Environment and Welsh Office programmes, as rent rebate subsidy in England and Wales will be paid from local authorities housing revenue accounts. The amounts for 1990-91 are:

Rent Rebates (England) £2,297 million
Rent Rebates (Wales) £158 million.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total number of people claiming sickness and invalidity benefit at the latest date available; and what was the number of people claiming sickness and invalidity benefit in March 1979 and 1989.

Mr. Scott: The total number of people claiming sickness or invalidity benefit at 28 February 1991, the latest date available, is 1,690,000[1]. This total is provisional and subject to amendment.

The total number of people claiming sickness or invalidity benefit on 31 March 1979 was 1,289,000[2]; and on 1 April 1989 was 1,392,000[2].

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will state the total number of supplementary benefit recipients, including dependents, as defined for community charge purposes for each year since 1979;

(2) what was the total number of persons dependent on both social security and housing rebates in (a) 1979-80, (b) 1984-85, (c) 1985-86, (d) 1989-90, (e) 1990-91, for the latest date available, and the forecast for 1991-92.

Miss Widdecombe: The information available is listed in the tables. No reliable data exist for the period before 1983-84 on numbers of claimants who got both supplementary benefit and help with housing or rate costs.

Notes:

(1) The available data relates to claimants only, not dependants.

(2) The figures partially overlap as eg. some people who get a rent allowance also get community charge benefit.

(3) No forecast has yet been made of community charge benefit caseload for 1991-92 because of the recent general reduction in charges.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are dependent on (a) income support, (b) family credit and (c) housing benefit, broken down into claimants, dependants and children for (i) the parliamentary constituency of Greenock and Port Glasgow, (ii) Inverclyde district council area, (iii) Strathclyde and (iv) Scotland as a whole.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 14 March 1991]: Income support and family credit information for the parliamentary constituency of Greenock and Port Glasgow and the Inverclyde district council area or in respect of the number of partners or children is unavailable and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. Benefits (Norwich)

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set out in the Official Report the number of people refused unemployment benefit in the Norwich area under the availability/actively seeking work rules since April 1990, the number of claimants in Norwich on income support who have had benefit penalties imposed through the use of the availability/actively seeking work rules since April 1990, and the number of social fund applicants in Norwich who have been refused loans in the last financial year because of local social fund budget restraints.

Mr. Jack: The information concerning income support recipients in the Norwich area who have had benefit penalties imposed through the use of the availability/actively seeking work rules is not kept and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Statistics on unemployment benefit adjudication are not separately identified for Norwich. To indicate trends, figures are provided at table 1 for the East Midlands and Eastern region, which includes Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, Northamptonshire, Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire, Suffolk and Nottinghamshire. The information is collected quarterly for the purpose of publication in the "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Quarterly Analysis of Decisions of Adjudication Officers", a copy of which is available in the Library. Monthly figures are not separately available.

Information on the number of people being refused social fund loans because of local social fund budget restraints is not collected. Table 2 shows the number of applications refused at the Mountergate and Chantry Norwich offices because they were considered to be for items of insufficient priority.

Social fund officers are required to take account of the local guidance on priorities, provided by the office manager, and they are further required to view each and every case on its merits having regard to the needs and circumstances of the customer. Wherever possible the social fund officer will look to elevate the overall priority of the application to ensure that payment is made. I understand that the managers of the Norwich local offices have written to the hon. Member separately on the subject of local guidance on priorities, and they will notify him of any future changes to this guidance.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to answer the letter from the hon. Member for Birkenhead, sent on 2 November 1990, and the reminder sent on 20 February 1991, about the chairman of the Attendance Allowance Board.

Mr. Scott: I replied to the hon. Member on 27 March.

Local Office, Cardiff

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to alter the disposition of offices for (a) the payment and (b) the processing of social security benefit claims in Cardiff.

Miss Widdecombe: The management team for the new Cardiff district has now been appointed and one of its main priorities is to look at ways to provide the best possible service to its customers. This will include considering a variety of options for organising work and paying benefits within the district. There will be the widest possible consultation with Members of Parliament, and with local statutory and voluntary organisations. Members of Parliament will, therefore, be kept consulted over any proposed changes affecting their constituency.

Miss Widdecombe: The information in respect of Scotland is as follows:

DEFENCE

HMS Endurance

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the future of HMS Endurance.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to my answer of 25 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), Official Report, column 304.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reports he has received from Colonel Mike Brooke of the Royal Engineers who is leading a six-nation ordnance clean-up team in Kuwait on the scale of the problems which are to be faced.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: British forces have been reporting through the military chain of command on a regular basis on their activities. These activities have principally involved immediate humanitarian assistance in Kuwait in areas where we have special expertise, including explosive ordnance disposal.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions are given to commanders in the Gulf on the treatment of private photographs or film used to record environmental and ecological scenes by service men stationed in the Gulf; whether confiscation is permitted; and what provision is made for confiscated film to be recovered.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I am not aware of any instructions on the treatment of private photographs or film of environmental and ecological scenes in the Gulf.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 21 March, Official Report, column 232, if he will set out in tabular form the optical and chemical properties of the oil smoke plume as measured by Royal Air Force aircraft.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Measurements made by the meteorological research flight aircraft within the smoke plume at about 100 km from Kuwait showed the following concentrations:

Sulphur dioxide—around 500 ppb (parts per billion); a typical value in an urban environment is 25 ppb.
Nitrogen oxides—around 25 ppb.
Ozone —around 40 ppb.

The nitrogen oxides and ozone levels are consistent with those found in an urban environment.

At the 100 km distance the soot concentration was about 150 micrograms per cubic metre and contained about 20,000 soot particles per cubic centimetre, 0·1 to 10 microns in size. Visually the particles caused substantial reductions of sunlight beneath the plume and almost complete darkness within the plume. At 1,000 km from Kuwait, particle concentrations within the plume were less than 1,000 per cubic centimetre, only the very smallest particles remained.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies have been made of the rise and temporary decline in temperature between convenient points in (a) region and (b) time (i) in Kuwait, (ii) Bahrain and (iii) on the Kuwait/Iraq border, as a result of oil-well fire effects.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The Meteorological Office has made estimates of the depression of maximum day-time temperatures in the Gulf area based on the generally sparse measurements of surface temperature that are available. When the smoke plume is overhead, calculations indicate that the day-time temperatures in Kuwait city are depressed by 4 to 6 degs. C, in Bahrain the depression is 1 to 3 degs. C. No surface measurements are available from the Kuwait-Iraqi border. Values similar to Kuwait city are expected. Larger depressions of temperature may occur close to the source of the plume and beneath high concentrations of smoke.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the work of the Royal Army Ordnance Corps in clearing mines and booby traps in the Ahmadi and Magwa oil fields.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: British forces have been providing assistance in Kuwait in areas where we have special expertise, including explosive ordnance disposal. Much has already been achieved and progress continues to be made. It is not possible to comment in detail on operations in specific areas as they involve several other agencies and can change from day to day.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the tonnage of bombs dropped by coalition forces on Kuwait and Iraq which (a) missed their target and (b) accurately hit their target.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The assessment of the effectiveness of weapons used by British forces during the conflict is not yet complete. Information is not available for other coalition countries.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information was received from the Soviet Union on the ground deployment of Iraqi forces during Operation Granby.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the practice to comment on such matters.

RAF Edzell

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who is funding the recently awarded contract for construction work on the communications building at RAF Edzell.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: This work is being funded by the United States navy.

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the role of RAF Edzell.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The role of RAF Edzell is to facilitate the interoperability of Royal Navy and United States navy communications systems, and to provide communications support to Royal Navy ships.

Oilfield Fires

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to measure and monitor the potential carcinogenic effects on service men of burning oil field smoke of (a) carbon monoxide, (b) carbon dioxide and (c) sulphur dioxide.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None. These compounds are not known to be carcinogenic.

International Military Services

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the intended future role of International Military Services in relation to overseas defence sales; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what arrangements he has made to sell International Military Services to the Saudi Arabian Government.

Mr. Alan Clark: The scale of IMS business is being re-assessed in the light of current market developments. Within overall Government policy, decisions on individual business ventures are matters for the company's commercial judgment and are regarded as commercial in confidence.

Iraqi Military Equipment

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 23 March, Official Report, column 264, to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) how much Iraqi equipment has been recycled in the period 23 March to 10 April.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Explosives and Propellants Agreement

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will place a copy of the explosives and propellants agreement between the Government and British Aerospace/Royal Ordnance in the Library;

(2) on what date the explosives and propellants agreement, between the Government and British Aerospace/Royal Ordnance, was signed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The explosives and propellants procurement agreement between my Department and Royal Ordnance was signed on 18 August 1986. The details are commercially confidential.

HMS Daedalus (Slipway)

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what powers are available to his Department for controlling access to and use of the slipway connecting HMS Daedalus to the sea at Marine Parade West, Lee-on-Solent.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence owns the slipway connecting HMS Daedalus to the sea at Marine Parade West, Lee-on-Solent. We therefore have the normal powers of a landowner to regulate access and thus to remove trespassers.

Radio Frequency Radiation

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has performed any trials of the use of radio frequency radiation as a weapon.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I have nothing to add to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton) to the hon. Member on 25 March, column 302.

Fox Hunting

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the organisations and individuals authorised to shoot foxes on Ministry of Defence land at Kirknewton camp, West Lothian, Scotland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No organisations or individuals have been authorised to shoot foxes on Ministry of Defence land at Kirknewton camp.

Sandhurst and Military Beagles

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who is responsible for the costs of staff for the Sandhurst and Military Beagles.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Royal Military Academy Sandhurst is responsible for the cost of the single kennel huntsman who is employed to look after the Sandhurst and Military Beagles and also part of the academy's grounds.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what agencies of the CSCE have so far been set up; what is the foundation and composition of each and where is it located; and when he expects ministers of the CSCE member Governments to meet to more closely define the functions of each of these agencies and enable them to make progress in achieving the tasks assigned to them.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Paris summit of the conference on security and co-operation in Europe established three institutions: secretariat, conflict prevention centre and office for free elections. The Paris charter, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, defines their size, composition and function.

The institutions are accountable to the Council of Foreign Ministers of CSCE states, which will meet for the first time in Berlin in June.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contributions the United Kingdom is making to (a) the Western European Union, and (b) the secretariat and crisis prevention centre of the CSCE and other agencies of that organisation; and what is the approximate manpower in post in each case.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom will meet 9·1 per cent. of the approved budgets of the CSCE secretariat, the conflict prevention centre and the office of free elections. When fully operational, these will have a total staff of eight, seven and five respectively. We meet 17 per cent. of the WEU budget. The overall staff total of WEU institutions is approximately 109.

Kuwait

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the availability of smog masks in Kuwait.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Many people living and working in Kuwait have acquired smog masks. There is no difficulty in importing them from Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what knowledge he has of the effect of mixture of hydrocarbons and chlorine in the drinking water in Kuwait.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Environmental damage to drinking water supplies and the build-up of hydrocarbons in the food chain in Kuwait are elements proposed as part of the comprehensive environmental assessment now being carried out by the United Nations Environment Programme together with other United Nations agencies.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what knowledge he has of the countries to which substantial numbers of the population of Kuwait have fled since the end of the war.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Many of those who were resident in Kuwait at the time of the Iraqi invasion have not yet returned. We have no information about residents who have left Kuwait since 28 February.

The ICRC, International Committee of the Red Cross, which has a delegation in Kuwait, is in touch with the Kuwaiti Government about the position of foreign communities, including those who may wish to leave the country.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what knowledge he has of the build-up of hydrocarbons in the food chain in Kuwait.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Environmental damage to drinking water supplies and the build-up of hydro-carbons in the food chain in Kuwait are elements proposed as part of the comprehensive environmental assessment now being carried out by the United Nations Environment Programme together with other UN agencies.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what evidence he has of the effects of oil pollution on the lungs of sheep in Kuwait.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the diaspora of Palestinians from Kuwait since 1 March.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We do not hold details of departures by Palestinian residents of Kuwait. We have repeatedly expressed our concern to Kuwaiti Ministers about reports of ill-treatment of Palestinians. ICRC representatives in Kuwait are now in touch with the Kuwaiti Government about their position.

Kuwait

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the ill-treatment and torture of Palestinians in Kuwait.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We continue to express our concern to the Kuwaiti authorities that Palestinians should be treated fairly and in accordance with the law. Our latest reports suggest that the situation is improving. The ICRC, which has been given access to Palestinian detainees, confirms that their conditions have greatly improved. We shall continue to monitor the situation and raise it with the Government of Kuwait whenever necessary.

Dried Milk (Embargo)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken since 8 March concerning the embargo on dried milk for Iraq being applied to Jordan.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: United Nations sanctions against Iraq do not apply to Jordan. We have no evidence that shipments of dried milk to Jordan have been affected.

NATO

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals are currently under discussion for the reconfiguration of NATO.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The NATO summit, held in London in July 1990, agreed on the adaptation of the alliance to the changes taking place in Europe. This review process, which is likely to be completed later this year, involves changes in NATO's strategy and force structures, including the development of smaller, more mobile and flexible active forces, increasing reliance on multinational formations, reduced readiness and training requirements and greater reliance on the ability to build up larger forces if and when they might be needed. In the nuclear field, the alliance will maintain for the foreseeable future an appropriate mix of nuclear and conventional forces, based in Europe, and kept up to date where necessary. But the size and tasks of NATO's nuclear deterrent forces will change. NATO's political role is also changing to reflect the changed political situation in Europe. The alliance has extended the hand of friendship to the Soviet Union and the eastern European countries. Contacts between these countries and NATO are increasing in frequency and scope.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement of forthcoming business in the European Community Council of Ministers.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Special European Council met on 8 April. Ministers discussed the political, security and economic aspects of the post-war situation in the Gulf. At British request, they considered the plight of the refugees in and from Iraq and agreed to provide 150 mecu in emergency aid. Ministers condemned the Iraqi Government's repression of its civilian population particularly the Kurds and called for the maintenance of sanctions while current Iraqi policies persist. Ministers also considered the conditions for peace and stability in the region and the role of the Community in the peace process. I also refer my hon. Friend to the statement on the situation in Iraq made in the House by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs this afternoon.

The Economic and Finance Council met on 8 April and discussed tax issues relating to road transport; the financial implications of the Commission's 1991-92 common agricultural policy price-fixing proposals; the Commission's proposals for a loan to Romania; articles 4 and 8 of the takeovers directive; and the regulated markets provision of the investment services directive. New proposals to remove withholding taxes on cross-border interest and royalty payments within groups of companies and to provide tax relief for the losses of companies' overseas permanent establishments and subsidiaries were formally presented to the Council, although without discussion. The Ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference on economic and monetary union on 8 April discussed progress made by Ministers' personal representatives over the last month, in particular focusing on capital liberalisation and transition to stage 2.

The Foreign Affairs Council will meet on 15 April and may discuss the follow-up to the informal European Council meeting of 8 April. It will review progress in the EC-EFTA negotiations on a European economic area and consider the next steps in the negotiations. The Commission might report on the negotiations taking place for association agreements with Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia. In EPC discussions, Ministers may discuss, inter alia, the latest developments in Iraq, Yugoslavia and Albania. Ministers will discuss EC-Japan relations including a draft declaration, which the presidency and Commission intend to agree with Japan in May and also the Commission's draft document on the energy charter. A ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference on political union will be held on 17 April and will discuss a full range of issues including an overview of progress in negotiations.

The Fisheries Council will meet on 18 April and will discuss the 10th and 11th amendments to the conservation regulation, the Commission communications on the common fisheries policy and data on the landing of fisheries products in member states.

The Agriculture Council will meet on 22-23 April and will discuss the 1991 price-fixing proposals and the agriculture aspects of the GATT Uruguay round.

The Research Council will meet on 24 April and may discuss relations with the European Parliament in the light of its request for the Commission to withdraw the five proposals for research programmes under the third framework programme on which the Council has agreed common positions. The Council will discuss the position of foreign-owned companies in Community research programmes. It is possible that common positions will be agreed on the information technologies, biomedical and health, non-nuclear energy, industrial and materials, and agro-industrial research programmes of the third framework programme.

The Industry Council will meet on 29 April and may discuss the Commission's communications on small and medium sized enterprises (SMEs), biotechnology and the future of the ECSC Treaty. Ministers may also discuss industrial policy, the consumer electronics and semiconductors industries and the state of work concerning the textiles industry (annual report).

Palestinians

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, further to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 259, whom he classifies as representative Palestinians; and what information he has on calls for elections in the occupied territories by Palestinians living there.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is not for us to say who should form a Palestinian delegation, but if a negotiation with Israel is to achieve results it is essential for this delegation to be able to speak on behalf of the majority of Palestinians. There is a continuing debate in the occupied territories on the desirability of elections there and the form these might take: no consensus has yet emerged.

Turkey

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what visits to the Diyarbakir region of Turkey have been made by Her Majesty's Government's staff from the embassy in that country; whether they visited the Iraqi Kurdish refugee camps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On 10 April a first secretary from our embassy in Ankara, together with a senior Overseas Development Administration official, travelled to south-east Turkey for a four-day visit to view at first hand the refugee camps and the effectiveness of the relief effort. Also, our air attaché in Ankara has been in Incirlik from the outset of the relief operation, and flew with the first RAF relief sortie.

Antarctica

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he consulted (a) the United States of America and (b) Japan on the recent review of Government policy towards Antarctica.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We did not consult the USA or Japan during the recent review of United Kingdom policy on Antarctica. However, once the review was complete we put the United Kingdom proposals to all Antarctic treaty consultative parties, including the USA and Japan, for their consideration in advance of the special consultative meeting in Madrid later this month.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are to be the objectives of the Government at the forthcoming meeting of Antarctic treaty parties in Madrid in April with regard to (a) a prohibition on mining, (b) the time limit on any prohibition and (c) the mechanisms necessary to extend the prohibition.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, wrote to all Members of Parliament on 25 March setting out the United Kingdom's proposals for a moratorium on mining in Antarctica which we believe may hold the key to a return to consensus.

We have not proposed a specific length for the moratorium or a mechanism for its termination or extension. We have, however, made clear our requirement that a legal vacuum at the end of the moratorium should be avoided. These issues will be taken forward at the meeting in Madrid.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which European Community partners he consulted on the recent review of Antarctica policy.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We did not consult our EC partners while conducting the review of United Kingdom policy on Antarctica. However, once the review was complete, we put our proposals to all Antarctic treaty consultative parties including France, Belgium, Italy, Spain, the Netherlands and Germany, for their consideration in advance of the special consultative meeting that will be held in Madrid later this month.

Japanese Prisoners of War

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards claims by British ex-prisoners of war for compensation against the Japanese Government for injury suffered during the 1939-1945 war.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The question of compensation for the sufferings of former British prisoners of war of Japan was settled in the 1951 treaty of peace with Japan. We received a total of £4,816,473 from the Japanese Government, which was paid to claimants in instalments between 1952 and 1956. The level of compensation was less than we would have wished, but it was agreed by the allied powers that the Japanese Government had fully discharged their obligations.

Libya

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his German counterpart about the involvement of German companies in the development of Libya's chemical weapons plant at Sebha; and if he will raise the matter at the next European Foreign Affairs Council.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have been, and remain, in close touch at all levels with the German authorities about this issue.

Kurds

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 13 March, Official Report, column 550, to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars), what recent meetings Her Majesty's Government's representatives have had with representatives of Kurdish movements in Iran, Iraq, Turkey and Syria.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister met Iraqi Kurdish representatives on 9 April. I met Jalal Talabani, leader of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, in Damascus on 12 March. Contacts between officials and Kurdish representatives continue.

Mr. Abdul Malik

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when a decision is to be taken on the application made by Abdul Malik (Ref: IMM/99947) to the post in Islamabad to join his wife in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In accordance with the guidelines on the handling of representations by Members of Parliament in immigration cases, issued to Members on 14 December 1988, I have referred the question to the correspondence unit of the migration and visa department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The hon. Member will receive a reply from the unit as soon as possible.

Mr. Rashad Mahmood

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when a decision is to be made on the application made by Rashad Mahmood (Ref: IMM/82219) to the post in Islamabad to join his wife in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In accordance with the guidelines on the handling of representations by Members of Parliament in immigration cases, issued to Members on 14 December 1988, I have referred the question to the correspondence unit of the migration and visa department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The hon. Member will receive a reply from the unit as soon as possible.

Solomon Smolyar

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Soviet Government about their failure to grant an exit visa to Solomon Smolyar of Leningrad who has been offered treatment at the Rambam medical centre in Haifa.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Mr. Smolyar's case is among those on which we regularly press the Soviet authorities, and has been raised again recently. We shall keep up the pressure until there is a satisfactory outcome.

European Parliament

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate has been made of the cost of not having a single seat for the European Parliament.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are not aware of any single official estimate.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Council of Ministers last discussed the seat of the European Parliament.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Council of Ministers has not held a formal discussion of the European Parliament seat for some years. But the subject has been discussed informally at various times. Heads of Government briefly considered the European Parliament seat at the Dublin European Council last June.

Hong Kong and China

Mr. Thorne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his visit to Hong Kong and China from 1 to 10 April.

Mr. Hurd: I paid an official visit to China from 3-8 April at the invitation of the Chinese Foreign Minister, and visited Hong Kong for a day at each end of that visit. This was the first visit by a Foreign Secretary to China since 1986.

In Peking I had two full sessions of talks with the Foreign Minister and met the Party General Secretary, the Premier, the chairman of the National People's Congress and the director of the Hong Kong and Macao Affairs Office. With the Foreign Minister, I covered major international issues of common concern, including the middle east, arms proliferation and Cambodia. We also discussed a number of bilateral matters, including commercial relations. I raised our concerns about human rights, including in Tibet, both with the Foreign Minister and with the General Secretary.

A central element in my discussions was Hong Kong. I told the Chinese that we wanted to intensify work on the practical issues which need to be resolved in order to ensure a smooth transition in 1997. In achieving this we need to respect two key principles. On the one hand, Britain, China and Hong Kong need to co-operate on the implementation of the joint declaration. On the other, the Hong Kong Government need to be able to fulfil their duty to govern effectively. Seeking the views of China on certain important matters, and paying close attention to those views where possible, is compatible with those principles, but the task of taking decisions rests with the Hong Kong Government.

The Chinese reaffirmed their support for the joint declaration and agreed that we should strengthen the work of the joint liaison group. We were unable to achieve a breakthrough on the question of Chinese support for the new airport in Hong Kong. It is an economic fact that private investment in such a project is unlikely to appear unless investors are confident that it has Chinese support.

Hong Kong

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what shark products in what quantities have been imported into Hong Kong in each of the last three years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 25 March 1991]: The only shark product of significant quantity imported into Hong Kong is shark fin. The following quantities have been imported over the past three years:

	Tonnes

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the Hong Kong authorities to make the next assessment of the total commercial ivory stock held within the colony.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 25 March 1991]: It is likely that the Hong Kong authorities will initiate the next assessment of the total commercial ivory stock held in Hong Kong towards the end of this year.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of the ivory exported from Hong Kong since 17 July 1990 in accordance with the CITES requirements.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 25 March 1991]: No commercial exports of ivory covered by CITES have been authorised since midnight on 17 July 1990 except for one pre-convention specimen, consisting of one antique piece weighing 0·1 kg.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 18 February, Official Report, column 55, if he will state the disposal arrangements for the ivory name seals and blocks seized in Japan.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 25 March 1991]: The disposal of the ivory name seals and blocks seized in Japan is a matter for the Japanese authorities. The seized items have not been returned to Hong Kong.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information is known to his Department about destruction by (a) coalition forces and (b) Iraqi forces of holy places at Samarra; and what he has done since his letter of 28 January to the hon. Member for Linlithgow to avoid damage.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have been asked to reply.

We have no information about damage to holy places at Samarra. Throughout the air campaign, coalition pilots attacked only military targets or facilities supporting Iraq's occupation of Kuwait. These attacks were carefully planned, and took account of the locations of Islamic holy places and sites of historical importance.

SCOTLAND

Primary School Testing

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total cost to date of introducing national testing in primary schools, including all costs for advertising, leafleting, training and additional materials in schools.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on 6 February 1991. Expenditure on leaflets and advertising has amounted to £250,000.

Crofting

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many crofting tenants there now are.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: According to the records held by the Crofters Commission, there were 13,444 crofting tenants at 31 December 1990. This figure includes crofters who are tenants only of a share or shares in common grazings.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many crofts in each crofting area have transferred from tenure to owner-occupancy under the terms of the Crofting Reform Act 1976.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is as follows:

Former county	Number of whole croft purchases[1] intimated to the Crofters Commission since enactment of the Crofting Reform Act 1976
Argyll	313
Caithness	317
Inverness (including Skye, Harris and Uists)	591
Orkney	191
Ross and Cromarty (including Lewis)	282

Shetland	322
Total	2,224

[1] In addition to the figures for whole croft purchases, 447 part-crofts have been purchased and 1,597 croft house sites.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many crofting tenants, by estate, of the Secretary of State have exercised their right to buy (a) the house site and (b) the croft, under the Crofting Reform Act 1976.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is set out in the tables.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the total cost to the Exchequer of the Crofters Commission in each of the past five years.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the crofting estates owned by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland with, in each case, the number of tenants, the acreage of inbye land and the acreage of common grazing.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information relating to crofting estates belonging to the Secretary of State is set out in the table. The Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department does not hold separately information relating to the acreage of inbye land or common grazing. The total hectarage figures given, however, includes both inbye land and common grazing.

Drinking Water

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information on the pollution of drinking water in Scotland, including levels of aluminium and other toxic substances, his Department is gathering.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Records are maintained of the quality classification of drinking water supply sources and of those supply zones where water does not currently meet the quality standards set in the EC drinking water directive and the Water Supply (Water Quality) (Scotland) Regulations 1990.

Where a standard is persistently infringed, a water authority may in certain circumstances apply for authorisation of a relaxation, but otherwise must submit an undertaking to make a necessary quality improvement within a specified time. There are separate arrangements for reporting specific pollution incidents or other significant water quality failures. No water supply zones have been notified as failing to meet the standards for any toxic substance. For lead arising from plumbing systems, water authorities are due to report by the end of this year on any zones where there is a risk that tap water will not meet the new lead standard, stricter than that of the EC directive, set in the water quality regulations.

The standard for aluminium, not classed as a toxic substance in the EC directive, may be relaxed if the aluminium is of natural origin. My answer to the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) on 4 March 1991, column 65-66, gave details of maximum authorised levels of aluminium in such cases.

Other substances such as nitrates and pesticides are the subject of specific inquiries to water authorities from time to time.

Annual reports to be published by water authorities by 30 June 1991 will provide information and data on water quality standards in all supply zones.

Education Spending

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total spending on education in Scotland as a percentage of Scottish gross domestic product in real terms in each year since 1978.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Public expenditure on education includes expenditure both by the Secretary of State directly and by education authorities. Details are as follows:

	Expenditure by Secretary of State and education authorities in real terms at 1989-90 prices (£ million)	Expenditure as a percentage of the Scottish GDP
1977-78	2,090	7·06
1978-79	2,107	7·06
1979-80	2,071	7·11
1980-81	2,159	7·67
1981-82	2,214	7·80
1982-83	2,366	8·16
1983-84	2,367	7·93
1984-85	2,318	7·74
1985-86	2,293	7·37
1986-87	2,379	7·24
1987-88	2,450	7·28
1988-89	2,475	7·04
1989-90	2,544	7·12

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure on (a) nursery, (b) primary and (c) secondary education by local authorities in Scotland in 1989-90.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is given in the table, which has been compiled from local authority financial returns.

Net current expenditure on nursery, primary and secondary schools 1989-90

	£ million
Nursery	39·658
Primary	605·294
Secondary	751·602

Feu Redemption

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what information he has concerning the current average cost of feu redemption; and whether he has any plans to abolish such a charge;

(2) if he has any plans to review the law on feu redemption.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information about costs of feu duty redemption is not held centrally. Before considering whether any legislation on this question is desirable, my right hon. Friend proposes to await the recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission on completion of its current major review of property law in Scotland.

Housing

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to meet the Scottish Homes board to discuss progress being made in the proposed disposal of former Scottish Special Housing Association houses in the Borders region in terms of the voluntary disposal procedures in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether, in the event of the disposal of the former SSHA houses in the Borders region being rejected in whole or in part, by a majority of the tenants or by himself, he would require to give his consent to any proposed agents to factor any properties remaining in the possession of Scottish Homes;

(2) if he will allow local authorities to be considered as appropriate bodies to compete to act as agents of Scottish Homes in any future factoring arrangements on expiry of exisiting contractual arrangements of Scottish Homes properties in the Borders region;

(3) what instructions he will give to Scottish Homes in terms of future factoring arrangements for former SSHA housing stock in the Borders region;

(4) if he will make a statement on how he intends to exercise his powers in section 3A of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988, relative to his consent being required for Scottish Homes appointing other persons to act as its agents.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In terms of Scottish Homes (Powers) General Authority 1989, a general authority given by my right hon. Friend in terms of section 2(3)(a) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988, Scottish Homes may appoint such agents as it considers necessary, on such terms and conditions as it thinks fit and reasonable. The general authority does not, however, authorise Scottish Homes to appoint agents to manage houses where the cost of doing so is greater than if Scottish Homes managed those houses without an agent.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, column 142, if he will publish the revised timetable for the proposed disposal of former SSHA housing stock in the Borders region including the time for Scottish Homes to process proposals to purchase stock.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has asked Scottish Homes to publish the proposed timetable and expects it to do so during May.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will now reconsider his policy of proscribing tenants choice of landlord in relation to the public sector; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has no plans to amend the relevant legislation.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, column 144, if he will now publish the safeguards he will insist upon as a condition of his consent to a voluntary transfer of housing stock under the provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 in protecting the interests of tenants against any private sector or voluntary sector landlord who is subsequently made bankrupt or goes into liquidation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have nothing to add to my reply of 5 March.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether multi-option ballots are to be allowed to be put to tenants under the voluntary disposals of former SSHA housing stock in the Borders region in terms of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In the guidance which my right hon. Friend has given to Scottish Homes there is nothing which prevents the agency from putting forward two or more options to the ballot stage for consideration by tenants. I understand that it remains Scottish Homes' intention, however, that at each ballot only one proposal for change will be put to the tenants.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is yet in a position to publish details of the burdens and other heritable conditions to be determined by Scottish Homes which are to be inserted in the title deeds of the heritable properties to be disposed of under the voluntary disposals of former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in the Borders region in terms of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988; what specific heritable conditions will be imposed to protect and safeguard future tenants; and what powers he has to vary any such conditions.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As stated in my reply of 5 March, these properties are owned by Scottish Homes and which, if any, burdens or other heritable conditions are imposed on the stock to be transferred is a matter for the agency.

My right hon. Friend has no powers to vary any such conditions, although he may take these into account in the giving or withholding of his consent to any disposal.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, column 144, regarding the valuation system to be adopted in any large-scale voluntary transfer of housing stock, what procedures are to be put in place to decide what condition the stock is in and who will arbitrate in the event of a dispute about the valuation of the necessary remedial work.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In terms of Scottish Homes' published procedures, the agency itself will undertake a current survey of the properties so that the condition can be established. As stated in my answer of 5 March, the district valuer will be invited to assess the market value of the stock. This valuation will be on the basis of open market value subject to existing tenancies with account being taken of the condition of the stock. Negotiations on the offers made by prospective landlords will be a matter for Scottish Homes.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what power he has to ensure that former SSHA tenants, currently holding tenancies with Scottish Homes, will continue to be the subject to affordable levels of rent in the event of being transferred to another private or voluntary sector landlord under the voluntary disposal of stock provisions in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The basis for determining future rents will form part of the overall proposal which will be put to tenants in the ballot which will precede the approval of any such disposal. Future rental increases will be determined by the provisions of the tenancy agreement and in the case of dispute will be subject to the arrangements for rental increases under assured tenancies under the provisions of sections 24 and 25 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988. These provisions allow the tenant to refer the prescribed notice of increase in rent to the rent assessment committee for determination.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what level of financial support he expects to pay to private sector landlords acquiring former SSHA housing stock in the Borders region in terms of the voluntary disposal provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988; and what financial support will be provided to cover elements of any management costs involved in making the successful bid to purchase.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Scottish Homes would be responsible for the consideration and payment of any request for financial support from a private sector landlord. It would be for the agency to consider, in the first instance, the elements of costs which might be assisted. In terms of section 3(a) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988, any proposal by Scottish Homes to provide financial support would require the approval of my right hon. Friend given with the consent of Treasury. Before granting that approval, he would wish to be assured that the assistance would be in accordance with his and Scottish Homes' policy objectives and would provide value for the public funds involved, relative to the competing demands for those funds.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to ensure that any tenants of Scottish Homes who do not wish to transfer to the private sector, in terms of the voluntary disposal of former SSHA houses in Borders region under the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 will be permitted to remain as tenants of Scottish Homes.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. However, my right hon. Friend will withhold his consent to any disposal if he is not satisfied that the interests of tenants have been fully protected and he will give his consent only if a majority of those replying to the ballot are in favour of the proposal put to them.

In the guidance which he issued to Scottish Homes in February 1991, my right hon. Friend asked Scottish Homes to ensure that tenants are advised of their rights and of all the opportunities available to them, as soon as possible after Scottish Homes' initial clearance of any case put to it for disposal. He will wish to ensure that advice has been given to tenants before giving his consent.

Breast Cancer Screening

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects the mobile breast cancer screening programme to be fully operational; and what is the total budget allowed for the programme in 1991-92.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The programme will be fully operational by August and the total budget for 1991-92 is £3·346 million.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps have been taken to advertise and publicise the mobile breast cancer screening units which are currently operational in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The arrangements for advertising and publicity are made by the health boards in consultation with the screening units. Publicity will be given prior to a visit by a screening unit to a local area and can take the form of a local or national press notice, local radio and television. In addition promotional seminars for the primary health care teams are held by the screening unit about one month in advance of a scheduled visit.

Information leaflets about the breast screening service in Scotland have been placed in all GP surgeries, in community centres and libraries.

Fish Farms

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he is giving to the problems of eider duck and golden-eye duck devouring substantial quantities of young mussels and other products on fish and shellfish farms.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Consumption of young shellfish by eider ducks or golden-eye ducks is known to occur at some shellfish farms. Licences can be issued by my right hon. Friend, under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, to shoot protected birds where that is necessary to prevent serious damage. So far no application for a licence to shoot these or other species of protected bird has been made in respect of a marine shellfish or fish farm.

Advice on non-lethal methods of deterring predation by these ducks at shellfish farms is being prepared by the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland in conjuction with the Association of Shelfish Growers and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. This advice will take account of the findings on such predation carried out by Aberdeen university department of zoology and commissioned by the HIDB and the Scottish Office.

Vacation Hardship Allowance

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how much was paid out in vacation hardship allowance in 1989-90 in Scotland;

(2) how many students received vacation hardship allowance in 1989-90 in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A total of £3,860·60 was paid in vacation hardship allowances to 14 students during academic session 1989-90.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the unemployment rate in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In February 1991, the Scottish seasonally adjusted unemployment rate was 8·2 per cent. of the work force.

Property Development

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will now relax the rules about the Scottish Enterprise or local enterprise companies only being property developers of last resort.

Mr. Allan Stewart: No. The right approach is to promote and, where appropriate, assist private sector develolpment and the normal functioning of the industrial property market in Scotland. There is no case for the use of public money to finance property development in cases where the private sector would be prepared to make the necessary provision.

Temporary Sheriffs

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current daily rate paid to a temporary sheriff sitting in the sheriff court in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The current daily rate effective from 1 April 1991 is £212.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many temporary sheriffs were employed in the Scottish courts for more than 80 per cent. of the available court sitting days in each of the last three years.

Mr. Lang: The information is set out in the table:

1990	3

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many temporary sheriffs hold commission to serve in sheriff courts in Scotland; how many sessions were put in by temporary sheriff courts for the latest period for which figures are available in Scotland; and what was the cost to his Department.

Mr. Lang: Ninety-three temporary sheriffs currently hold a commission to serve. Between 1 March 1990 and 28 February 1991, temporary sheriffs sat on 4,300 occasions at a cost of approximately £1,100,000.

Primary Schools (National Testing)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received on national testing in primary schools; and how many were for his proposals and how many against.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: To date 1,100 representations have been received covering a complete spectrum of views on testing.

School Inspections

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what are the intended and actual frequencies of inspection by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools in Scotland for (a) nursery schools, (b) primary schools, (c) secondary schools, (d) further education colleges, (e) centrally-funded institutions, (f) community education services and (g) other services;

(2) how the frequency of inspection by Her Majesty's inspectors has altered for various categories of educational institution since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 4 February 1991]: Each year a management plan for Her Majesty's inspectorate is agreed with the Secretary of State. This establishes a programme of inspections which will provide the necessary information on an agreed range of issues from a balanced sample of schools. The inspections vary in nature, from full inspections which examine all aspects of the work of an institution and lead to a published report on the institution, to more limited selective inspections which focus on a particular issue and may contribute to a published or an internal report. The configuration of the inspection programme therefore varies in accordance with the issues under investigation.

Publication of reports on full inspections began in 1983 and the numbers of reports on institutions published since then are as follows:

	Reports published
Session	Nursery	Primary	Secondary-independent	Special	College	Community	Total
1983-84	4	112	23	6	3	3	151
1984-85	7	118	21	9	1	2	158
1985-86	9	112	24	11	4	2	162
1986-87	11	116	26	6	2	2	163
1987-88	10	113	23	4	4	3	157

Session	Nursery	Primary	Secondary-independent	Reports published Special	College	Community	Total
1988-89	9	86	20	6	2	2	125
1989-90	6	69	18	4	2	1	100

The reduction in the number of full inspections in 1988-89 and 1989-90 was to accommodate an increase in surveys of aspects of education and other priority work undertaken by the inspectorate. There has been a corresponding increase in the rate of publication of aspect reports in recent years. In 1988-89 16 of these were published, and 22 in 1989-90, compared to an average of six per session in earlier years.

Bathing Water

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the amounts of loans received from the European investment bank in each of the past three years which were used for the improvement of river and bathing water quality.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 28 March 1991]: No loans from the European investment bank for this purpose were received in Scotland during 1988 to 1990.

Local Government Finance

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the anticipated income for each local authority in Scotland for 1991-92 from (a) aggregate external finance and (b) community charges.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 25 March 1991]: The figures are shown in the table.

Footnotes

1. The Community charge income figures shown are local authorities' own budgeted estimates for 1991-92 of community charge receipts from personal, collective and standard charges, inclusive of community charge benefits and receipts from the transitional relief and community charge reduction schemes. They accordingly reflect the position before the decision to increase the level of central government support for local authorities and to reduce all 1991-92 personal community charges by £140.
2. Aggregate External Finance includes revenue support grant, estimated non-domestic rate income and estimated specific grants for each authority. An additional £47·2 million of specific grant relating to the urban programme expenditure has not yet been allocated to individual authorities.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were (a) gross local authority revenue expenditure, (b) net local authority revenue expenditure, (c) rate support grant/revenue support grant, (d) local authority income from non-domestic rates and (e) local authority income from domestic rates/community charges at constant prices for each year from 1978-79 to 1991-92.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 25 March 1991]: The information is set out in the table:

Notes:

1. Gross revenue expenditure figures are only obtained from local authorities in Local Financial Returns (LFRS). The LFR is for 1988-89.
2. The figures in column 2 are taken from LFRS to 1988-89, Final Outturn returns for 1989-90, Provisional Outturn returns for 1990-91 and Budget Estimate returns for 1991-92.
3. In column 3 the figures represent the redetermined amounts of rate and revenue support grant where appropriate.
4. The figures in column 4 are Final Outturn to 1988-89. For 1989-90 to 1991-92 the figures represent the Non-Domestic Rate Income estimated by the Department as part of AEF.
5. In column 5 the figures are Final Outturn to 1988-89 and Provisional Outturn for 1990-91. The 1991-92 figure shown is the total of local authorities' own budgeted estimates. It reflects the position before the decision to increase the level of central government support for local authorities and to reduce all 1991-92 personal community charges by £140.
6. All figures have been converted to real terms by means of the Treasury GDP deflator (March 1991). All years are at 1990-91.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the anticipated net local authority revenue expenditure and gross local authority revenue expenditure for 1991-92 for (a) all regional council services, (b) education, (c) police and fire services, (d) social work, (e) roads and transport, (f) loan charges attributable to regional services, (g) all district council services, (h) leisure and recreation services, (i) loan charges attributable to district council non-housing services, (j) cleansing services, (k) libraries and museums and (l) environmental health services.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 25 March 1991]: The only information at present available to my Department in relation to expenditure in 1991-92 is based on local authorities' budget estimate returns. These show that authorities plan expenditure on services supported by aggregate external finance and personal, collective and standard community charges as follows:

	Column 1 Revenue expenditure £ million	Column 2 Loan and leasing charges £ million	Total columns 1 and 2 £ million

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients at the state hospital at Carstairs no longer require to be kept in secure wards and could be returned to semi-secure wards at local hospitals if they existed.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 26 March 1991]: Where patients are suitable for transfer, arrangements will be made for this to take place.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Imprisonment (Remission)

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those offences, other than relating to non-payment of the poll tax, for which there is no remission in cases of imprisonment.

Mrs. Rumbold: In addition to those imprisoned for non-payment of the community charge, inmates in custody in the following circumstances are not eligible for remission.

(i) non-payment of: rates; a maintenance order; any civil debt; sums due under legal aid contribution orders; sums due on forfeiture of a recognisance; costs ordered to be paid by a magistrates' court; debts under the Debtors' Act 1869;
(ii) non-compliance with court orders other than financial penalties;
(iii) most civil offences.

Full details of the terms of imprisonment that do not attract remission are set out in prison standing order 12, a copy of which is in the Library. A revised version of the standing order, to be published in a few months' time, will include reference to the community charge.

Broadcasting

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about ultra high frequency television coverage and the future of the relay programme in the light of the prospective privatisation of the transmission operation system previously owned and operated by the Independent Broadcasting Authority.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The announcement made on 4 July 1989 by the then Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), confirmed that it was our intention to privatise the transmission networks owned and operated by the BBC and the IBA as soon as we were in a position to do so. The IBA welcomed the proposal and the Broadcasting Act provided for the IBA's replacement by two new regulatory bodies—the Independent Television Commission (ITC) and the Radio Authority —and a transmission company which is to be privatised. The transmission company, National Transcommunications Limited (NTL), started trading on 1 January this year. The position of the BBC's transmission operation will be reviewed in the run-up to the expiry of its royal charter at the end of 1996.

The existing BBC and independent television services currently reach about 99·4 per cent. of the United Kingdom population. The BBC and the IBA have shared responsibility for a rolling programme of relay station construction. The current policy on the relay programme was announced on 20 May 1980 by the then Home Secretary, Lord Whitelaw, who said that approval had been given to proposals to extend UHF coverage to groups of fewer than 500 whenever it was reasonably practicable to do so. Because of the varied nature of these small groups, there could be no obligation on the BBC and the IBA to provide a service to them and a precise lower limit could not be specified. In practice, groups of fewer than 200 have not benefited from the programme.

In addition, the 1980 statement announced new arrangements for self-help television schemes, generally serving groups not qualifying under the relay programme. There are now over 300 groups covered by the scheme. The BBC and the IBA have provided advice on the new schemes which are continually being established.

It is our aim to see existing UHF television coverage of the four main terrestrial channels maintained and increased where appropriate. We have agreed that the existing programme of up to 25 relay stations a year should be maintained until 1996 when we will reconsider the position, including alternative forms of delivery. We have also agreed that the BBC and the ITC should continue to be responsible for providing advice on new self-help schemes, with assistance from NTL.

The BBC will continue its part of the relay programme as at present. The ITC will work with the BBC to determine the order and rate at which the stations are to be constructed, co-ordinating with the ITV companies or Channel 3 licensees, Channel 4 or S4C as appropriate. Responsibility for the IBA's share of relay planning and construction will fall to NTL. Until 1993 the necessary additional coverage requirements will be implemented by means of the contracts between the ITC and the ITV companies, and the contracts between those companies, Channel 4, S4C and NTL. From 1993, the Broadcasting Act provides for the ITC to set technical standards of quality, coverage and reliability in the Channel 3 and 4 licences and for the Welsh Authority to provide S4C to high technical standards. NTL will be obliged by its own Telecommunications Act licence to provide services enabling the ITV, Channel 3 and Channel 4 companies and S4C to meet the required standards of coverage which will include the continuation of the relay programme until 1996, or as then further decided.

Fire Service

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Government have for the Fire Service College.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has decided that the Fire Service College should become a candidate for executive agency status under the Government's "Next Steps" initiative. The projected launch date is 1 April 1992.

The college, established under the Fire Services Act 1947, is the principal provider of training to officers in local authority fire brigades. It provides technical training in firefighting and fire safety and courses on command and management for all grades of fire officer. It also trains students from the private sector and from overseas. The recent introduction of direct charging of brigades commensurate with their use of the college's facilities enables the college to be more responsive to the individual needs of its customers. Executive agency status will provide the college with the flexibility and control necessary to deliver high-quality training more cost-effectively and responsively.

My right hon. Friend fully appreciates the close interest taken by the local authorities and the fire service in maintaining high professional standards through training at the college and there will be full discussions with the constituent members of the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council and other interested parties over the coming months.

Police Complaints Authority

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is making any changes in the membership of the Police Complaints Authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The right hon. Roland Moyle is retiring from his post as deputy chairman of the Police Complaints Authority when his term of appointment expires on 28 April. I wish to take this opportunity to thank him for his service with the authority. His knowledge and experience have made an outstanding contribution to the establishment of the authority as a key part of the police complaints system.

Peter Moorhouse, who has been a member of the authority since July 1988, has accepted my invitation to succeed to the vacant deputy chairman post on 29 April.

Interception of Communications

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made following the expiry of the terms of appointment of the members of the interception of communications tribunal on 10 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Sir Cecil Clothier, KCB, QC, Mr. David Calcutt, QC, Mr. Ivor Guild, CBE and Mr. Peter Scott QC have been reappointed for a further five years as members of the tribunal established under the Interception of Communications Act 1985. Their new terms of office commenced on 11 April.

TRANSPORT

British Rail

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the expected outturn for British Rail's external financing for the 1990-91 financial year.

Mr. Rifkind: British Rail's external financing requirement for 1990-91 was £1,016 million. This represents an overshoot of £316 million on the revised limit of £700 million. British Rail will publish full details of the 1990-91 financial year in the annual report and accounts in July.

Road and Rail Expenditure

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the planning totals of Department of Transport expenditure on road and rail, respectively, for each of the three decades from 1960 to 1989.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 15 April 1991]: Consistent information in terms of planning totals is not available. However, road and rail investment in Great Britain for the three decades is as follows:

Road and rail investment: Great Britain[1]

£ million in cash prices

	Road[2]	Rail[3]
1960-69	2,330	1,190
1970-79	7,440	2,190
1980-89	16,850	6,220

[1] Because of definitional changes, figures can only be used to give broad comparisons.

[2] Expenditure by central and local government on new construction and improvement on all roads, and major structural maintenance on motorway and trunk roads.

[3] Investment in rolling stock and infrastructure by British Rail, London Underground Limited, Dockland Light Railway and Manchester Light Rapid Transit. British Rail channel tunnel investment is included but not investment by Eurotunnel plc.

ENERGY

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what evidence he has that privatisation of electricity in Great Britain has led to a reduction in electricity prices to consumers.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is too early to assess the full impact of privatisation and the introduction of competition on electricity prices. However, since April last year consumers have, for the first time, been protected by price controls against unjustified increases and, under the phased arrangements for the transition to full competition, large users, outside the franchise, have been able to negotiate the keenest available terms from potential suppliers.

Gas Turbine Power Stations

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether, pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 359, to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), he has any proposals to change the criteria he uses in considering the granting of consent for new gas-fired combined cycle power stations under (a) section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 or (b) the Energy Act 1976; if he will consult the Director-General of Ofgas in such considerations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: There are currently no proposals to change the criteria for the Secretary of State for Energy's consent under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to construct new gas-fired generating stations. The Government are aware that the EC directive restricting the use of gas in generating stations was repealed on 18 March 1991. We therefore intend to repeal the powers relating to the use of natural gas in power generation contained in section 14 of the Energy Act 1976 at the earliest legislative opportunity. In the interim period, the Government will continue to exercise those powers in a manner consistent with previous practice.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Finsbury Park and Highgate Offices

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many staff are currently employed at Finsbury Park and Highgate DSS offices; how many were employed in March 1990; how much of the work has been transferred to other offices in the past year; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The numbers of staff employed in Finsbury Park and Highgate offices are as follows:

PRIME MINISTER

HMS Endurance

Q9. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to continue the deployment of HMS Endurance in the south Atlantic including South Georgia and Antarctica; and if he will make a statement on the replacement of the present vessel by the mid-1990s

The Prime Minister: Endurance will return from her current deployment in the south Atlantic in May, which is the end of the Antarctic summer. Studies into the best way of fulfilling the role currently undertaken by Endurance are continuing.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what requests Her Majesty's Government have had for air cover from anti-Saddam forces in (a) northern Iraq and (b) southern Iraq.

The Prime Minister: We have received a number of representations requesting the coalition forces in the Gulf to prevent the Iraqi air force from flying missions. Security Council resolution 688 demands that the Iraqi Government should end their repression of their own people. We are working urgently to create safe havens for Iraqi refugees. The United States has warned Iraqi aircraft not to fly north of the 36th parallel.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with the United States Government about a permanent (a) United States, (b) United States/British and (c) coalition presence in Iraq.

The Prime Minister: We have no intention of establishing a permanent coalition presence in Iraq. Our recent contacts with the Americans have focused on the need for urgent humanitarian aid to Iraqi refugees both in the north and south of the country. We shall continue to maintain close contacts with the United States on the way ahead.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) of 14 March, Official Report, column 1095, what discussions he has had with the allies on the subject of the use of chemical weapons in Iraq.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The use of chemical weapons by Iraq is a matter of great concern and has been discussed on many occasions with our allies. We have no firm evidence that such weapons were used during or after the Gulf conflict. At our instigation United Nations Security Council resolution 687, which has been accepted by the Iraqi Government, sets out the United Nations terms for the destruction of Iraq's chemical weapons capability and affirms that grave consequences would follow any use by Iraq of such weapons.

WALES

Welsh Agricultural College

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to finance the Welsh agricultural college, Aberystwyth, in the future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Arrangements have been made for officials to discuss the future of the Welsh agricultural college with officers of the WAC joint education committee later this week.

EC Wild Birds Directive

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Countryside Council for Wales regarding the implications of the Leybucht Bay judgment of the European Court of Justice on 28 February in Luxemburg on the proposals for development in Welsh estuaries in special protection areas or candidate special protection areas under the wild birds directive 1979.

Sir Wyn Roberts: None.

Science Base

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his policies to encourage the growth of a science base in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts [holding answer 27 March 1991]: The Government's policy with regard to science is designed to operate on a United Kingdom basis. The aims of the Government's science programme are to advance knowledge and technical capability; to train scientific manpower at postgraduate level; and in these and other ways to contribute to the realisation of economic, social and cultural benefits for the United Kingdom. Financial support is channelled through the research councils and other funded bodies. Higher education institutions in Wales can and do receive support from these funds for research activity in Wales.

In addition, many projects in Wales are funded by the Department's own research and development programme which covers the whole range of its responsibilities. The Welsh Office estimated expenditure on research and development in 1991-92 is £3·1 million.

The Department also specifically seeks to promote and develop the science base within the NHS in Wales. To this end the provision of training for clinical scientists is currently under review. The Department also sponsors the Welsh scheme for the development of health and social research which specifically supports the career development of research workers. In addition Welsh Office-sponsored projects account for some £1·1 million of the £22·9 million held by the Department of Health for the combined England and Wales health and personal social services research programme for 1991-92.

Some of the Department's industrial policies also have a direct effect in strengthening the more commercially oriented aspects of our science base. For example there are the activities of WDA Technology Marketing, the WDA support for various major centres of excellence within the university of Wales, the proposed Imperial science park at Newport and our promotion of relevant Government and European schemes such as LINK, the teaching company scheme and the collaborative research and development grant support at both the United Kingdom and European level including through the pan-European EUREKA programme.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Local Management of Schools

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 234, on the implications of local management of schools, what system has been established to ensure that recoupment charges payable to the providing authority are earmarked for the specific school concerned rather than absorbed in the overheads of that providing authority.

Mr. Fallon: As I had intended to make clear to my hon. Friend in my answer of 22 March, formula allocations to schools under an LEA's scheme of local management are calculated on the basis of the number of pupils in schools, regardless of where those pupils live. Schools will automatically receive funding for out-county pupils at the same level as for pupils who live within the authority. In this way schools receive in their budgets credit for the pupils whom they have attracted from another authority.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Sub-Post Offices

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list, by region, the number of sub-post offices which have (a) opened and (b) closed since 1979.

Mr. Leigh: Decisions on the provision of post office services in particular areas are an operational matter for the Post Office. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the period mentioned has seen considerable organisational change in the Post Office and I understand that the information is not available in the form requested.

The Post Office has, however, told me that the overall number of post offices has fallen from 22,639 in 1979 to 20,401 in 1991. Within this total the number of agency offices—which includes both rural and sub-post offices, community offices and restricted hours offices—has fallen from 21,056 to 19,160 over the same period.

Chief Executives

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy on the employment as chief executive of a company of a person who has held a similar position in a company that has failed.

Mr. Lilley: In general there is no legal impediment to the appointment of the chief executive or any other officer of a failed company to a similar position in another company. However, any company considering such an appointment would wish to consider carefully the prospective appointee's performance record. Moreover, there are safeguards provided in the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 which requires every liquidator, administrative receiver or administrator to submit a report to the Secretary of State if he considers that the conduct of a director of an insolvent company has been such as to make him unfit to be concerned in the management of a company. An application may be made to the court for such a person to be disqualified from acting as a director or from being involved in the management of a company. During the year ended 31 March 1991 the Secretary of State directed that 499 such applications be made to the courts.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to obtain from his counterpart in the United States a copy of the Commerce Department's latest assessment of countries capable of producing chemical weapons and export control guidance given to industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: We work with other like-minded countries, including the United States, in taking harmonised international measures to prevent the proliferation of chemical weapons.

There are regular meetings at which information is exchanged on new controls and procedures.

The Gulf

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the potential value to British industry of contracts to reconstruct parts of Kuwait and Iraq following the Gulf war.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Department has not sought to estimate the value of Kuwait reconstruction work to British industry. Various estimates of the total cost of reconstruction work have been made, most commonly in the region of US $50 billion.

Company Projects

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list grant funding available to United Kingdom companies undertaking feasibility studies for projects in Europe, both inside and outside the European Community.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 27 March 1991]: The overseas projects fund operated by my Department provides assistance to the pre-contractual expenses, including feasibility studies in certain circumstances, of British companies seeking contracts for major projects outside the European Community. Information on grant funding from other sources could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Middle East

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what communications he has had in the current year with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in regard to the middle east region.

Mrs. Chalker: We receive regular reports from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on its activities in the middle east region, and we are in very close touch over the current Iraq crisis.

Honduras

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current aid programme to Honduras and the equivalent figure for each of the last 10 years; what participation the United Kingdom takes in the EC programmes that affect Honduras; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The bilateral country programme runs at about £1 million a year; we provide disaster relief when appropriate; the Commonwealth Development Corporation invests in Honduras. Gross United Kingdom bilateral aid expenditure (including CDC) and the United Kingdom share of EC aid from 1980 to 1989 were as follows:

	Gross United Kingdom bilateral aid £,000	United Kingdom share of EC aid £,000
1980	335	510
1981	5,002	780
1982	2,272	1,350
1983	6,670	980
1984	3,446	1,880
1985	3,653	480
1986	1,258	520
1987	811	520
1988	1,166	640
1989	701	[1]

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Honduras

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings have been held by Her Majesty's ambassador and staff in Tegucigalpa with human rights organisations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Her Majesty's ambassador in Tegucigalpa meets periodically representatives of the main Honduran human rights organisation. He is also in regular contact with Ministers and officials on human rights questions.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Government of Honduras concerning their treatment of trade unionists; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: None. No issue has been brought to our notice either directly affecting British interests or giving sufficient grounds for general concern such as to merit representations.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Taxation

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters have been received by his Department on the subject of tax simplification since 1 September last year from industrial and commercial companies; and how he proposes to respond to these representations.

Mr. Maude: A total of 113 letters have been received on the subject of tax simplification, following my hon. Friend's circular to finance directors of industrial and commercial companies. I have assured all those who have written that I very much share the concern that the tax system should avoid unnecessary complexity and that we shall continue to introduce simplifications wherever possible.

European Community

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the latest meeting of the European Community Economic and Finance Council, the meeting of the intergovernmental conference on economic and monetary union and the interinstitutional meeting with the European Parliament.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The ECOFIN Council met in Brussels on 8 April. The intergovernmental conference on economic and monetary union met that morning when there was also an interinstitutional meeting of Ministers with the European Parliament. The Minister for Corporate Affairs and I represented the United Kingdom at ECOFIN and I attended the IGC and the meeting with the European Parliament.

A Commission initiative concerning the debt owed to the Community by the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries linked by the Lomé convention was discussed, but it was agreed that the proposal was inconsistent with the international debt strategy. A modified proposal may be discussed by a future Council.

The Council reached agreement in principle to provide guaranteed loans to Romania equal to the amount offered by the non-EC members of the G24 up to a maximum of 375 million ecu.

Ministers also discussed agricultural price fixing. I made clear the Government's determination not to increase the agricultural guideline calculated in accordance with the 1988 budget discipline decision; and emphasised the importance which the Government attach to respect for budgetary discipline.

The future taxation of road transport was also discussed, but without agreement. The Commission made a brief presentation of two company tax measures which are currently before the Council and which concern the taxation of cross-border interest payment and royalties and the treatment of tax relief for losses within groups of companies. There was no discussion of these measures.

There was a brief discussion of the proposed takeovers directive but no significant progress towards an agreement. Several member states, including the United Kingdom, expressed major reservations about the Commission's proposals.

On the investment services directive, the Council discussed a compromise text from the Presidency on the issue of regulated markets. The Commission proposed a further compromise for discussion at a future Council.

The ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference on EMU focused on the transition from stage 1 to stage 2 of EMU. Differing views emerged on the degree of economic convergence necessary before a move to stage 2. I argued that it was necessary to determine the content of stage 2 before taking any decision on when it should start; and that economic convergence was a key element in making further progress towards economic and monetary integration. The United Kingdom proposals would establish, in stage 2, a mechanism to encourage convergence on the best inflation performance.

I also attended the inter-institutional meeting held with the European Parliament to allow Members of the European Parliament to put their views on the EMU IGC to Finance Ministers. Members of the European Parliament expressed a range of views. The meeting was purely consultative in nature.

Overseas Investment

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 268, on overseas investment, if he will provide a similar table for investment from outside the EC only.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 15 April 1991]: Complete information on inward investment in the European Community from outside the EC is not available. However, the Statistical Office of the European Communities, in a recent study, made estimates of foreign direct investment in EC member states, adjusted to exclude intra-EC flows. These estimates exclude reinvested profits because a number of member states do not compile such information. The figures for the United Kingdom given in the table below are therefore on a different basis from those published by the CSO. The information is as follows:

Inward net foreign direct investment (excluding reinvested profits) in the EC
(Excluding intra-EC investments)

Civil Servants (South Dorset)

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many civil servants work in south Dorset now; and how many of these jobs are currently subject to active review to be either removed or relocated.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 15 April 1991]: There were around 4,900 non-industrial civil servants in south Dorset at 1 January 1991. Equivalent data for industrial staff are not available.

No information is collected centrally about Departments' plans for the removal and relocation of posts in particular regions, so it is not possible to give figures for those posts in south Dorset under active review.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Beef Imports

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has about the use of drugs in beef imports from the Republic of Ireland; and if he will make a statement on the safety of imported beef from the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Maclean: Beef from the Republic of Ireland is routinely monitored as part of the extensive programme of surveillance of veterinary drugs residues carried out by the Ministry. A total of 400 imported samples of beef muscle, liver and kidney were taken during 1990, of which about one fifth are estimated to have been from the Republic of Ireland. To date, within the hormone and beta-agonist groups, only one positive from Ireland has been found. This was for the hormone Zeranol, and did not pose a threat to human health. Full results of the Ministry's programme of veterinary drug surveillance for the years 1986-90 are to be published in a food surveillance paper which is now in preparation.

Veterinary Medicines

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what performance targets he has set for the Veterinary Medicines Directorate in 1991-92.

Mr. Gummer: The chief executive of the Veterinary Medicines Directorate (VMD) and I have agreed the following targets for 1991-92:

full cost recovery for the three business activities of licensing, policy work and residues monitoring;

100 per cent. of new licence applications to be issued within 120 clock days; an overall efficiency gain of 2 per cent.

These are more demanding targets than those set in 1990-91 and they reflect the good progress being made by the VMD as a "Next Steps" agency.

Microwave Ovens

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will publish his response to the Agriculture Committee's first report of 1990-91 on microwave ovens.

Mr. Gummer: The Government's response has been published today and copies are being placed in the Library of the House. The Government response endorses many of the conclusions reached by the Committee. In particular, it endorses the Committee's conclusions that there is nothing inherently unsafe about microwave ovens, that efforts to improve the performance of microwave ovens should be regarded as sensible precautionary measures, and that it is incumbent on oven manufacturers and retailers to ensure that consumers are furnished with the necessary instructions to enable them to cook food properly. These principles underlie what MAFF is seeking to achieve through its microwave working party.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Ridley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the proportion of local authority revenue expenditure paid in rate or revenue support grant in 1979-80, 1989-90 and 1990-91 respectively; and what was the total of the grant in each of those years expressed in 1989-90 prices.

Mr. Heseltine: The information for the English local authorities is as follows:

	Rate/revenue support grant as a proportion of local authority expenditure	Rate/revenue support grant expressed in 1989-90 prices
		£ million
1979-80[1]	0·49	15,792
1989-90	0·29	9,577
1990-91	0·26	8,807

[1] England and Wales.

Glass Fittings

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce higher mandatory standards for the quality of glass fitted in new homes, rather than an advisory code.

Mr. Yeo: The Department has issued a consultation paper proposing that requirements controlling the glazing used in critical locations in new houses and other buildings should be included in the Building Regulations 1985. Such requirements would have legal force, and would be supported by detailed practical guidance about ways in which they could be met including guidance on the quality of glass to be used. Responses to the consultation paper are currently being considered, and it is hoped that final decisions can be taken later this year.

Prestwich Hospital, Salford

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he turned down the planning application from Salford health authority relating to the redevelopment of part of the Prestwich hospital, Salford, site; and when he received this application.

Sir George Young: Permission was refused on 23 August 1989 for the proposals called in on 2 September 1987.

An appeal for a new scheme is currently before my right hon. Friend.

Hazardous Waste (US Bases)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on shipments of hazardous waste to England for disposal from United States military bases in Turkey, Greece, the Azores and Iceland during the last 10 years (a) reported under the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations and (b) not so reported; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The consignment note system under the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988 is designed to ensure that waste is disposed of safely at suitable facilities. It does not require consignees to identify the source of the hazardous waste. There have been very few shipments of waste from these countries and none of these has been consigned directly by the United States forces.

Endangered Species

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had with his opposite numbers in the European Community Council of Ministers concerning the further European Community directives on the protection of endangered, valuable or rare plant and animal species.

Mr. Baldry: The proposed Council directive on the conservation of natural habitats and wild fauna and flora has been discussed at several meetings of the European Community Council of Environment Ministers. At the meeting held on 18 March my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Environment and Countryside welcomed the significant progress achieved by the Presidency and said that the United Kingdom was fully committed to the objectives of the proposed directive.

EC Wild Birds Directive

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had with the Environment Commissioner of the European Community regarding the implications of the Leybucht Bay judgment of the European Court of Justice on 28 February, for the development proposals currently affecting Britain's estuarial special protection areas and candidate special protection areas designated or to be designated according to the European Community wild birds directive of 1979.

Mr. Baldry: None.

Landfill Gas

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the results of the survey into the incidence of landfill gas production at landfill sites undertaken by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: In December 1987 HM inspectorate of pollution asked all waste disposal authorities in England and Wales to provide details of all landfill sites producing landfill gas.

In order to update the information obtained from the first survey, HMIP issued further requests for information in August 1988 and May 1989. The responses to these have been considered by the inspectorate and their conclusions are set out in a recently published report which has been sent to all waste disposal authorities in England and Wales. Copies have also been placed in the Library of the House.

The Government allocated £33 million in 1990-91 to enable local authorities to carry out remedial works to such sites, and further resources are available in future years. So far take-up by authorities of these resources has been slow with less than £12 million expected to be spent in 1990-91. I hope that the publication of this report will encourage authorities to put forward new proposals for remedial works at gassing landfill sites.

Tarmac Plant, Derbyshire

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is now in a position to reply to the letter sent to him by Mr. J. Cooper, Clock Cottage, Spinkhill, Derbyshire, at the start of February, concerning the operation of the Tarmac plant at Renishaw, Derbyshire.

Mr. Baldry: [holding answer 27 February 1991]: I am now in a position to reply and Mr Cooper will receive a letter within a few days.

Community Charge

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the number of people who will benefit from the community charge reduction scheme (a) nationally and (b) in the area covered by Kirklees council.

Mr. Key [pursuant to the answer, 27 March 1991, Official Report, c. 456]: Our estimate of the number of charge payers in England who will benefit from a community charge reduction in 1991-92 is about 16 million.

Mr. Andrew Mackay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the workings of the community charge reduction scheme in relation to properties which were not individually rated.

Mr. Key [pursuant to the answer, 27 March 1991, Official Report c. 456]: The effect of the recent changes which we have made to the community charge reduction scheme is that the calculation of reductions must be based on the total number of eligible charge payers resident in a property or a group of properties which formed one hereditament. Under transitional relief the calculation was limited to two community charges where there were two or more eligible charge payers. This change will help in particular people living in larger households or houses of multiple occupancy and people living in groups of properties which shared one rateable value only.

HEALTH

National Health Services Practices

14. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from representatives of health authorities in the north as to practices within the national health service.

Mr. Waldegrave: I meet, and receive correspondence from, health authorities in the north on a wide variety of matters concerning the national health service.

Hospital Waiting Lists

16. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number of persons currently on waiting lists for hospital in-patient treatment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: At 31 March 1990, the latest available date, there were 710,253 people waiting for in-patient treatment in England, excluding those who had asked for their admission to be deferred. This is 6 per cent. less than in 1979. Furthermore, in the 12 months to March 1990 the number waiting over a year for in-patient treatment fell by 9 per cent. and 5 per cent. fewer people now wait over a year than in 1979.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number of persons currently on waiting lists for hospital in-patient treatment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: At 30 September 1990, the latest available information, there were 705,706 people waiting for in-patient treatment, excluding those who had asked for their admission to be deferred. It is the time individual patients wait that matters, not the total number on the list. In the 12 months to March 1990 the number waiting over one year for in-patient treatment fell by 9 per cent. and by a further 2 per cent. in the following six months to September 1990.

Psychotherapy

17. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many representations have been received by his Department concerning the conduct towards their clients of private psychotherapists, counsellors, hypotherapists and analysts.

Mr. Dorrell: One; the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) wrote to me on 28 January 1991 drawing attention to a potentially distressing case.

NHS Administrative Costs

18. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the cost of administration and organisation within the national health service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The cost of headquarters administration at regional and district health authorities in the national health service in England for 1989-90 was £730 million, which represents 4 per cent. of total revenue expenditure.

20. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of the additional administrative costs to the national health service of the implementation of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have provided more than £380 million to the national health service in 1991-92 to meet in full the additional costs of implementing the national health service review. This includes over £80 million for the introduction of additional consultant posts and for the development of audit for general practitioners and nurses, as well as funds for developments outside the area of direct patient care.

Divorce (Conciliation Services)

22. Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what responsibilities his Department has for the provision of conciliation services for couples pending divorce.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The lead responsibility for conciliation lies with the Lord Chancellor's Department. The Department of Health has no direct responsibility.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence he has of pressure being put on employees against participating in the formation of NHS trusts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend has written recently to the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) about a letter issued by the hon. Members for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) and Coventry, North-East (Mr. Hughes), to the manager of a hospital which is in the process of applying for NHS trust status. The letter effectively threatened him with dismissal unless he agreed to withdraw the application. I am pleased to say that the right hon. Member for Islwyn dissociated himself from these bullying tactics and I hope that the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) will do likewise.

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his assessment of how NHS trusts will improve the local nature of the health service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: NHS trusts will be better able to respond to patients' needs through greater freedoms and flexibility. They will also encourage greater local involvement and pride.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the progress towards establishment of NHS trust hospitals.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) earlier today.

Lung Cancer, Liverpool

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the percentage rate of lung cancer in Liverpool among women and men; and what the Liverpool mortality rate is in comparison with the United Kingdom rates.

Mr. Dorrell: The latest figures available show that in 1985 the incidence among males was 0·18 per cent. and 0·07 per cent. among females. The mortality rate in 1989 was for males 13·8 per 10,000 of the population compared with 9·8 nationally and for females 7·8 per 10,000 of the population compared with 4·2 nationally.

Health Care (Ethnic Minorities)

25. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the Government are doing to improve access to health care for people from ethnic minorities.

Mr. Dorrell: The Government are committed to promoting equality of opportunity for ethnic minorities in the provision of health services. This involves positive action to take account of differences in the incidence of disease, and in language and culture.

We have launched a number of initiatives to improve the quality of health care for ethnic minorities and to promote access to information on health promotion and the health services available. Some examples are: funding a report by the National Association of Health Authorities to advise health authorities on how to improve services for ethnic minorities; funding a seminar in 1988 for NHS senior managers on delivering services for ethnic minorities; piloting, through the Asian mother and baby campaign, the use of link workers to help overcome language and cultural barriers to communication; spending £500,000 a year to produce materials to improve access to health services; funding projects to develop good practice guidance to help improve access to services; and recently funding a compendium of good practice in family health service work.

The NHS reforms establish each health authority's responsibility to secure appropriate health care for all its population. Each health authority will assess the health needs of its population and plan services accordingly, ensuring that the services available are both relevant, and accessible, to the whole local population including members of ethnic minorities.

The 1991 census will include, for the first time, a question on ethnic origin and it is proposed to include equivalent information on patients in the data collected by health authorities. This will enable health authorities to plan and target services effectively. The Department is also funding the establishment of a database on ethnic minority health which will gather information on good practice, on developments in services for ethnic minorities, and epidemiological data. These sources of information taken together will help health service planners to assess the health needs of ethnic minorities, to plan appropriate services, and to monitor the effectiveness of services.

Prescriptions

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prescription items were dispensed free in the last year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In 1990 276·9 million items were dispensed free in the national health service.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of a prescription in 1979 in current prices; and what is it now.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In 1989-90, the latest year for which information is available, the average cost of a prescription in the family health service in England was £6·36. In 1979-80 the cost at 1989-90 prices was £4·92.

Huddersfield Resource Management Scheme

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the resource management scheme operated by Huddersfield health authority.

Mr. Dorrell: Huddersfield health authority has made excellent progress with the implementation of resource management at Huddersfield royal infirmary, since the hospital was named as a resource management pilot site in 1986. The work at Huddersfield and the other five pilot sites has provided valuable information about resource management, and is being used to support the extension of resource management to all other large acute hospitals in the country.

Mentally Ill People

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to monitor and evaluate the continuing care of mentally ill people resident in the community.

Mr. Dorrell: We will continue to monitor and evaluate services for mentally ill people through the established arrangements for reviewing health authorities' performance and inspection of social services provision by the social services inspectorate. Provision for the mentally ill is also subject to review by the health advisory service.

General Practitioner Budgets

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those general practitioners' practices in the Sunderland, Hartlepool and Durham health authorities intending to hold their own budgets as from April in the current year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Peter Carr, the chairman of the Northern regional health authority, for details.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will arrange for a copy of the financial profile produced by the Audit Commission for each district health authority to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Dorrell: The health authority audit profiles are drawn up to assist the Audit Commission in its examination of the health authorities. A copy is made available to each of the authorities concerned. The Audit Commission's reports on the accounts of the health authorities, and certain other reports, are made public but there are no plans for working documents such as audit profiles to be made more widely available.

Nicotine Chewing Gum

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when nicotine chewing gum will be given pharmacist-only status; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: An order amending SI 1983 No. 1212, The Medicines (Products other than Veterinary Drugs) (Prescription Only) Order, was laid on 10 April and is due to come into operation on 1 May. This will give effect to changes in the legal status of a number of medicines, including allowing the 2mg strength of a nicotine chewing gum, licensed as an aid to smoking cessation, to be supplied from pharmacies without a precription.

NE Thames RHA

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the projected 1991-92 central programme for the North East Thames regional health authority; and how much of it will be funded from anticipated capital receipts.

Mr. Dorrell: I understand that North East Thames regional health authority is planning a capital programme for 1991-92 of £103·4 million. The region expects to receive £8·4 milion from previous land sales and hopes to achieve further sales during the year.

Friern Barnet Hospital

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number of patients in Friern Barnet hospital, what plans he has to ensure that on closure they will all be in satisfactory accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: I understand that there are currently 477 patients in Friern Barnet hospital. The satisfactory transfer of these patients and the provision of associated new residential and day facilities on the hospital's closure, is a matter for North East Thames regional health authority. Since 1 April all psychiatric patients who are discharged, or are being considered for discharge, are subject to the care programme approach contained in circular HC(90)23/LASSL(90)11, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Hospital Safety

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about safety in hospitals in Stockport.

Mr. Dorrell: In any workplace the responsibility for complying with health and safety legislation rests with the employers and others in the workplace. This also applies to hospitals in Stockport. The Health and Safety Executive is responsible for enforcing health and safety legislation in hospitals.

Joint Finance

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total expenditure on joint finance for each year since 1983-84, in (a) cash and (b) real terms.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 8 March 1991]: The summarised accounts of regional and district health authorities in England record total expenditure on projects jointly financed with local authorities as:

Dentists

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists were registered with each FHSA covering the Greater London area on 1 October 1989, 1 October 1990 and 28 February 1991, respectively.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 21 March 1991]: The information requested is shown in the following table. In addition, the tables set out in my previous replies on the same subject on 14 March 1991, c. 643-44 and on 21 March 1991, c. 197-200 have been revised for purposes of ease of interpretation and consistency of response and they are also presented as follows.

Note: The figures in all three tables are derived from information on the number of registered dentists on an FHSA list as notified by FHSAs to the Dental Practice Board. Since some dentists practise in more than one FHSA, the total number of dentists is less than the sum of the dentists who have contracts with individual FHSAs. As the DPB calculates this information at the end of each month, the figures provided are for 30 September 1989 and 30 September 1990, rather than 1 October 1989 and 1 October 1990.

EMPLOYMENT

Clothing Manufacturing (Easington)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on how many workers have been made redundant and how many are on short time in the clothing manufacturing industry in the Easington constituency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: In January 1991 (the latest month for which data are available) there were no confirmed redundancies in the footwear and clothing manufacturing industries (SIC(80) 45) in the Easington constituency. Estimates on short-time working are not available at constituency level.

European Social Fund

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list all payments to each training project in Greater London from the European social fund due for each of the last five years, the date on which each payment was made and the total number of payments still outstanding for each project.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. I am, however, writing to the hon. Member.

Disability

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has for developing the Employment Service's special services for people with disabilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Helping people with disabilities is an agreed priority for the Employment Service agency. In 1989-90 it placed 76,900 people with disabilities into jobs.

Following consideration of comments on the consultative document, "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities", I have now agreed with the agency major improvements in the special help which it currently provides through disablement resettlement officers, the disablement advisory service and the employment rehabilitation service.

New local teams will be set up, over the next 12 to 18 months, to provide more accessible, professional and integrated special help to individuals and employers. The teams will offer to individuals specialist advice, assessment and help in finding and keeping jobs, and to employers encouragement and help in applying good practice. Staff training will be strengthened.

The Employment Service will now implement the plans for improved employment rehabilitation announced in the consultative document. These will involve more use of voluntary and other agents. Nine Employment Service centres—in West London, Bristol, Birmingham, Nottingham, Leeds, Manchester, Newcastle, Cardiff and Glasgow—will be developed as centres of excellence. The Employment Service expects to be able to phase out the others over up to five years as adequate agency provision is put in place. Access to residential rehabilitation will be assured for those who require it.

Following those changes, local coverage of specialist assessment and rehabilitation will be substantially increased, the Employment Service's own service will be more coherent, professional and effectively managed, and have a higher profile; and sources of expertise and commitment in the wider community will be more effectively harnessed. They represent major improvements in the quality of service to both individuals and employers and will help more people with disabilities to get and keep suitable jobs.

I will take decisions on possible developments in other forms of help provided by the Employment Service to people with disabilities after relevant comments on "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities" and the "Evaluation of the Special Schemes for People with Disabilities" have been fully considered.

SCOTLAND

Local Government Finance

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total Scottish local authorities' (a) current expenditure and (b) capital expenditure in real terms as a percentage of Scottish gross domestic product in each year since 1970.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The available information is given in the table.

Figures on the Scottish gross domestic product are not available for 1970 and are not yet available for 1990. The interim years' figures were supplied by the Central Statistical Office.

Local Authority Child Care

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children in Scotland were received into local authority care where the specific cause was family homelessness, in every year since 1979 until the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The numbers of children admitted into care primarily because of family homelessness were as follows:

	Number
1979	[1]67
1980	[1]65
1981	[2]41
1982	[2]20
1983	[2]22

1987	21
1988	18

Health Boards

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland from what date health boards will be responsible for their capital charges.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The capital charging system came into operation on 1 April 1991 and health boards have become responsible for the capital charges on their assets from that date.

Agriculture

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the future organisation of the agricultural scientific services of the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department.

Mr. Lang: I have decided that under the "next steps" initiative the agricultural scientific services should be a candidate for executive agency status within the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department.

Environment

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement concerning the amount of grant aid being made available under the special grants (environmental) programme in 1991-92 to voluntary bodies in Scotland working in the environmental field.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am pleased to announce that the grant aid totalling £239,250 has been offered to the following voluntary bodies in the financial year 1991-92, to assist them in carrying out environmental conservation, improvement or educational work in Scotland:

APRS	2,250
Buchan Countryside Group	2,250
Centre for Human Ecology	5,000
Council for Scottish Archaeology	13,000
Community Service Volunteers	7,000
Environment Centre	5,250
Friends of the Earth (Scotland)	13,800
Highland Forum	9,000
John Muir Trust	4,500
Locus	1,750
National Society for Clean Air	3,860
Royal Zoological Society of Scotland	3,500
Rural Forum	15,000
Royal Society for the Protection of Birds	10,000
Scottish Community Woods Campaign	6,250
Scottish Conservation Projects	27,750
Scottish Ecological Consultants	2,000

Scottish Environmental Education Council	27,150
Scottish Field Studies Association	7,500
Scottish Historic Buildings Trust	13,000
Scottish Rights of Way Society	5,000
Scottish Scenic Trust	2,000
Scottish Wildlife and Countryside Link	9,500
Scottish Wildlife Trust	23,000
Strathclyde Building Preservation Trust	7,000
Venture Scotland	2,165
Water of Leith Conservation Trust	5,000
West Galloway Fisheries Trust	1,275
Woodland Trust	4,500

A further £35,750 is being held in reserve to support suitable projects which will further the aims of the Government's White Paper, "This Common Inheritance".

The experience of the schemes has been generally very good. I am satisfied that the grants now offered will, as they have done in the past, greatly assist the voluntary organisations to increase the level of their activity and do much useful work.

Forestry

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will arrange for the Forestry Commission's regional advisory committees to publish an account of their meetings held to consider disputed grant aid and felling applications and of the advice they give to the Forestry Commission in such cases.

Mr. Lang: We addressed the question of publicising the work done by the Commission's regional advisory committees in their consideration of disputed grant aid and felling proposals when we responded to the Agriculture Committee's report on land use and forestry last May. We concluded that it would not be practical or conducive to the committees' conciliation role in such cases to throw open their discussions with the applicant and the objecting authority or authorities to anyone who wished to attend. We did, however, ask the Forestry Commission to look at the possibility of an account of such meetings and of the regional advisory committee's subsequent advice to the Forestry Commissioners being published. I am pleased to say that such information will be provided in all future cases in the form of a press release to be issued at the stage that the committee reports to the commissioners.

This is an important change which I am sure will be widely welcomed. It will make the work of the committees in this area more open and serve to demonstrate the value and objectivity of their contribution.

Household Statistics

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give a breakdown of the numbers of households in Scotland according to whether they contain one, two, three or more adults aged over 18 years and the percentage this represents in each category of the total number of households.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The available information gives the number of persons aged 16 and over rather than over 18 years old in the household. Estimates of the numbers of households containing one, two, three and four or more persons aged 16 and over (either living alone or with children under the age of 16) in Scotland are given in the following table.

Estimated number of households in 1991 containing:	Number ('000s)	Per cent of total households
1 person aged 16 and over	583	29
2 persons aged 16 and over	1,005	50
3 persons aged 16 and over	281	14
4 persons aged 16 and over	141	7

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the latest available estimate of the number of households in Scotland which consist of one adult only and of the likely number in five, 10 and 20 years' time, respectively;

(2) what is his latest available estimate of the number of households in Scotland and of the number in five, 10 and 20 years' time, respectively.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: Projections of the numbers of households in Scotland are at present available for the years to 2005 only. Figures for that year and the others requested are set out in the following table. Projections of the numbers of households consisting of one adult rather than one person are not available.

	Total households	Households containing one person
1991	2,009,330	535,770
1996	2,072,750	589,680
2001	2,111,070	638,140
2005	2,134,760	676,180

Community Charge

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what estimate he can make of the cost to his Department in 1991-92 of payments to local authorities to reduce individual liability for the poll tax under the reduction scheme announced in the Budget; and what will be the net cost after allowing for the clawback on the rebate scheme, community charge reduction scheme and other savings;

(2) what he estimates will be the net benefit to poll tax payers in Scotland in 1991-92 of the reduction scheme announced by the Chancellor in the Budget.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The general reduction of charges in Scotland will cost about £490 million. After taking into account consequent reductions in the amounts paid by way of community charge benefit and community charge reduction and the enhancements that have been made to the community charge reduction scheme, additional resources of some £380 million will be available.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many poll tax payers in Scotland in 1991-92 he estimates will have their liability in that year reduced by £28 as a result of the poll tax reduction scheme announced in the Budget.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: About 600,000.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are registered in Scotland for poll tax purposes at the latest available date for which figures are available.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: As at 1 July 1990, 3,834,410 people were included in the community charge registers in Scotland. This figure includes full-time students (who are liable only for 20 per cent. of the community charge) but excludes those liable for collective or standard charges.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the cost to his Department of paying compensation to local authorities for their administrative losses arising from the poll tax reduction scheme announced in the Budget.

Mr Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: Local authorities will be compensated for the additional administrative costs associated with the issuing of revised community charge bills for 1991-92. We will be consulting the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities about the detailed arrangements.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people in Scotland will benefit from the poll tax transitional relief scheme in 1991-92; and how that figure will be varied when the community charges reduction scheme is in operation.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The personal community charge reduction scheme has replaced the personal community charge relief scheme with effect from 1 April 1990. It is expected that about 1 million people will benefit from the reduction scheme in respect of the financial year 1990-91 and about 600,000 in 1991-92, following the reduction of charges under the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act 1991.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many poll tax payers in Scotland will benefit in 1991-92 to the full extent of £140 under the reduction scheme announced in the Budget.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: At least 2·25 million.

Tenants

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total number of public and private sector tenants, respectively, in Scotland at the latest available date for which figures are available.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: Estimates of the stock of dwellings by tenure are published quarterly in the Scottish Office Statistical Bulletins on housing. Copies are sent to Members representing Scottish constituencies and are available in the House Library. These give the numbers of dwellings rented privately or with a job or business, and rented from local authorities, new town corporations or Scottish Homes. Estimates of the number of tenants who occupy these dwellings are not available.

Dwelling Units

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he can give an estimate of the number of domestic dwelling units in Scotland at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: Estimates of the stock of dwellings in Scotland are published quarterly in the Scottish Office Statistical Bulletins on housing. Copies are sent to Members representing Scottish constituencies and are available in the House Library.

DEFENCE

Submarines (Movement Limitation)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many representations he has received for limiting the presence of submarines in intensive fishing areas.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In the past six months the Ministry of Defence has received some 70-80 such representations from hon. Members, borough councils and members of the public.

Nuclear Reactors, Tuwaitha

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the appropriate Soviet and French authorities were contacted in regard to the design details of the nuclear reactors at Tuwaitha before the authorisation of an attack on the facility; and what attempts have been made subsequent to the bombing of the reactors to ascertain the extent of the damage inflicted.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As the design and construction of the two reactors at Tuwaitha were well known prior to the Gulf conflict, there was no need to approach the Soviet or French authorities before the attack on the facility by coalition forces. It is very unlikely that there has been any significant radioactive contamination outside the immediate area of the site, because of the nature of the reactors and local topographic features. Inspections of Iraq's nuclear facilities to be carried out in accordance with Security Council resolution 687 adopted on 3 April should provide an opportunity to determine the effects of the allied attacks.

Honduran Service Men

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether training facilities have been provided to service men from Honduras in the current year and in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: According to available records, no United Kingdom military training has been provided to Honduras during this period.

Weapon Storage Vaults

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further information he has on United States proposals to build new weapon storage vaults at their bases in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Agreement has now been reached on a programme to instal the new weapon storage and survivability system at certain airbases operated by the United States air force in the United Kingdom, as part of a wider NATO-funded infrastructure programme.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ulster People's College

Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what proposals he has to provide core funding for the Ulster People's college as part of the cross-community education initiative;

(2) what funds have been received by the Ulster People's college from his Department since 1982; and for what purposes;

(3) what request he has received from the Ulster People's college for funding for full-time staff for community relations work.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department of Education has made available to the college grants totalling £153,132 as follows:

£65,132 from 1982 to 1988 in respect of the salary and other costs, including the production of learning materials, of a tutor-organiser undertaking a project on "Culture and Political Education";

£60,000 from 1985 to 1988 in respect of a community area education project; and £30,000 in 1990 in respect of a contribution towards the purchase of the college premises.

In 1989, the college requested the Department of Education to provide an annual grant of approximately £160,000 for community relations activities. No offer of annual grant was made and the Department has no plans to provide core funding grant aid to the college at the level sought.

In 1990, the Department undertook to make a £25,000 grant, initially in 1991-92 and in 1992-93, for the development of a community relations project among young people.

Investors

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table to show the number of prospective investors from (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the United States of America, (c) Japan and (d) other European Community countries which (i) his Department, (ii) the Industrial Development Board and (iii) the Local Enterprise Development Unit have taken to each council area in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years.

Mr. Needham: The number of prospective investors from Great Britain, the United States, Japan and other European Community countries who have been taken by the Industrial Development Board to each council area in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years is detailed in the table. The information relates to first-time visits only and in some instances these visits concentrated on detailed discussions with the Industrial Development Board and were confined to IDB house, Belfast. In addition a number of inward investment missions, comprising groups of companies, visited Northern Ireland over the period.

The Department of Economic Development and the Local Enterprise Development unit have not taken any prospective investors from those countries to district council areas during that period.

Council Clerks

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many clerks to a council in Northern Ireland are members of (a) an education board and (b) a health board.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Traffic Lights

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will provide a filter system at the traffic lights at the junction of Regent street and William street, Newtownards, for the use of traffic turning right from Regent street into William street.

Mr. Needham: A survey will be carried out within the next few weeks to ascertain whether a filter system is necessary at this location.

Belfast Action Team Programme

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the extent of the Belfast action team programme in (a) Braniel estate and (b) Belvoir estate in the borough of Castlereagh.

Mr. Needham: The Belfast action team initiative does not extend to these estates.

Strangford Lough

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when was the last inspection of the sea walls and water defences around Strangford lough; and what is the programme for maintenance of these walls.

Mr. Needham: The sea walls and water defences around Strangford lough were last inspected during January 1991. A programme of routine maintenance costing approximately £20,000 is carried out every year. In the current financial year an extra £50,000 has been allocated for this purpose.

Civil Servants

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show the number of civil servants in each branch who are to be moved to Castle Court in Belfast; what are the numbers of (a) Roman Catholics, (b) Protestants and (c) others in each branch so moved; how many new posts and at what levels are to be created by this movement; what area is to be taken into account in assessing whether fair employment exists in the staff so transferred; and what effect the transfer of these staff to Castle Court is expected to have on the proportions of Roman Catholics, Protestants and others employed in the civil service in Castle Court.

Dr. Mawhinney: There are currently 308 civil servants located within Castle Court. A further 406 civil servants are to be transferred to Castle Court as follows:

Branch	Number of staff
Central Benefits	288
Disability and Incapacity Benefits	69
Industrial Injuries	32
Ancillary	17

The number of new posts being created as a consequence of the move to Castle Court is:

Grade	Number of staff
Staff Officer	1
Executive Officer I	2
Executive Officer II	2
Administrative Officer	2
Administrative Assistant	1
Support Manager Grade 3	1
Support Grade Band 1	5
Support Grade Band 2	19

The Northern Ireland civil service has an equal opportunities monitoring system which contains information on the sex, community background and disability of its staff. However disclosure of information on the community background of Northern Ireland civil service staff is governed by a code of practice which stipulates that no statistical summaries will be produced which fall outside the categories of analyses agreed with the equal opportunities Whitley committee.

The Northern Ireland civil service recruits on a wide basis. The community background of successful candidates plays no part in determining the office to which such candidates are posted. Consequently there is no reason why a particular office in terms of its community background should represent the local community in which it is located. An assessment of fair employment for the staff in question is thus inappropriate and has not been undertaken. Fair employment considerations are addressed for the Northern Ireland civil service and details of the community background of staff together with their sex and any disability is given in the series of reports published by the NICS's equal opportunities unit which is based in the Department of Finance and Personnel of the Northern Ireland civil service; copies of these reports are placed in the Library.

Employment Statistics

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the male employment rate in Northern Ireland as at 1 January in each of the last three years.

Mr. Needham: Estimates of the civilian work force are produced on a quarterly basis and relate to March, June, September and December of each year. Estimates of the male civilian work force and the proportion in employment at December in each of the last three years are as follows:

December	Male civilian work force in employment[1] (number)	Male civilian work force (number)	Males in employment as a percentage of male civilian work force
1988	340,340	419,960	81·0
1989	343,350	417,720	82·2
1990	348,090	421,260	82·6

[1] Including the self-employed and those involved in work-related Government training schemes.

Capital Works

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table to show the sums expended by his Department on capital works in each council area in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years (a) in total, (b) per elector and (c) per capita.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is not available in the form requested; departmental expenditure is not disaggregated by district council area. Total capital works expenditure by Department for 1985-86 to 1989-90 is as follows:

Department	1985-86 £ million	1986-87 £ million	1987-88 £ million	1988-89 £ million	1989-90 £ million

Employment Prospects

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what sums he has expended in each travel-to-work area in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years in order to increase the prospects of employment in each of the areas.

Mr. Needham: Information in the form requested is not readily available and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he intends to take during the current year to increase the employment prospects of (a) men and (b) women in (i) the Coleraine council area, (ii) the Limavady council area, (iii) the Magherafelt council area, (iv) the Londonderry council area and (v) the Strabane council area.

Mr. Needham: The full range of financial assistance and advice provided by the Department of Economic Development, the Industrial Development Board and the Training and Employment Agency and their associated public bodies is available to increase the employment prospects of both men and women in the five district council areas listed.

In addition, employment opportunities will be increased as a result of a number of Government-sponsored special initiatives. These include the Londonderry initiative and the CRISP programme (funded by the Department of the Environment and the International Fund for Ireland) which seeks to bring economic and environmental benefits to disadvantaged areas.

Job Creation

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table to show (a) the number of jobs created in each local government area in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years by (i) the Local Enterprise Development Unit and (ii) the Industrial Development Board, (b) the cost per job created in each case, (c) the total expenditure and (d) the employment sector in which such jobs were created.

Mr. Needham: The information cannot be supplied in the form requested as figures on job creations are not available. However, table A shows the number of jobs promoted by LEDU and IDB in each local government area in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years. Tables B to D also show for the same period the average cost per job promoted, the financial assistance offered by LEDU and IDB to promote these jobs and the employment sectors in which the jobs were promoted. The figures in tables B to D relate to Northern Ireland as a whole as this information is not available by local government area.

Census

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether a validation survey will be carried out in relation to the Northern Ireland census on similar lines to the validation survey planned for the Great Britain census; and whether the same confidentiality rules will apply.

Mr. Hanley: Yes. In line with the plans for Great Britain, a voluntary validation survey on the Northern Ireland census will be carried out to check both the accuracy of the information and the completeness of coverage. Information gathered in the survey will be treated in the same strict confidence as information given on the census form itself. The confidentiality of information collected in the survey will be covered by the Census Act (Northern Ireland) 1969 as amended by the Census Confidentiality (Northern Ireland) Order 1991. The results of the survey will be laid before Parliament and published as soon as possible after the census.

TRANSPORT

HGV Speed Limiters

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will bring forward proposals to make it mandatory for all heavy goods vehicles of over 7·5 tonnes gross vehicle weight to be fitted with speed limiters.

Mr. Chope: The Department has consulted about a proposal to require new heavy goods vehicles of more than 7·5 tonnes gross vehicle weight to be fitted with speed limiters, to ensure that these vehicles cannot be driven at more than 60 mph, their motorway speed limit. I am considering the response to this consultation.

HGV Drivers

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many HGV drivers lost their licences at the age of 45, 50, 55 and 60 years respectively, in each of the last three years; and if he will give the figures by disease or illness for each category in each year.

Mr. Chope: Prior to 1 April 1991 decisions on fitness to hold these licences were a matter for the statutorily independent traffic commissioners. Separate statistics relating to decisions taken on medical ground have been maintained since 1988. These are set out below. Details of the ages of the drivers concerned or the medical conditions in question are not available.

	April 1988 to March 1989	April 1989 to March 1990	April 1990 to March 1991
Refusals	1,735	2,391	[1]—
Suspensions	706	783	[1]—
Revocations	2,462	1,716	[1]—

[1] Figures not yet available.

Road Traffic Accidents

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of road traffic accidents and the numbers of injuries and deaths that have taken place on the stretch of the A19 which passes through the Easington constituency for 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: For the section of the A19 within the Easington constituency the accident figures available for 1990 are as follows.

	Number
Number of road traffic accidents	16
Number of personal injuries	30
Number of deaths	2

The accident rate is higher than I would wish although it is lower than the national average for similar trunk roads.

Pelican Crossing

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects work to be commenced on the A6 trunk road pelican crossing between Kibworth Harcourt and Kibworth Beauchamp in Leicestershire; and if the consultations by his Department with the local people concerned are yet completed.

Mr. Chope: Responses to the Department's proposals are still awaited from Kibworth Harcourt and Kibworth Beauchamp parish councils. I would expect construction work to begin about six months after the satisfactory conclusion of the consultation with local bodies.

Roadside Lighting

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to install roadside lighting along that stretch of the A19 running through the Easington constituency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The installation of roadside lighting on the A19 between Murton and Easington is planned for this financial year.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Parents (Appeals)

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will outline the rights of parents of children who have been refused admission to the secondary school of their choice after they have lost their appeal to the local council.

Mr. Fallon: Parents have a right to appeal to an appeal committee, which is independent of the local council, against the council's decision as to the school their child should attend. If their appeal is unsuccessful they may complain to the Secretary of State, who can intervene if he believes that the council has acted unreasonably in refusing to admit the child to the parents' preferred school. "Unreasonably" in this context has the meaning given to it in administrative law: a body has acted unreasonably in this sense if it has acted in a way in which no sensible body, bearing in mind its statutory responsibilities, could decide to act.

Wandsworth CTC

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what sums have been pledged by ADT in respect of the city technology college, Wandsworth; and on what dates and in what amounts these sums are due.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the dates and amounts of funds actually paid over by ADT in respect of their sponsorship of the city technology college, Wandsworth; in what form such payments have been made; and to whom the payments have been made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: ADT plc has agreed to pay £1 million and to underwrite a further £700,000 as their contribution of the capital costs for establishing the Wandsworth city technology college. A schedule of payments is being drawn up.

ADT has made two payments of £500,000 and £250,000 which were paid in August 1990 and March 1991 respectively, towards the college capital programme.

I congratulate ADT on its public-spirited sponsorship of a very attractive project to improve educational opportunities for children in south London, which is making good progress.

Science

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response he is making to the problems of the lack of qualified science teachers in respect of science key stages 1 and 3.

Mr. Fallon: We have taken measures to improve the supply of teachers in shortage areas. A number of these are targeted specifically at science, including the extension of the initial teacher training bursary to biology as well as chemistry and physics courses, support for the development of distance learning materials in physics, chemistry and primary science, teaching taster courses and the undergraduate work experience scheme.

In the current financial year, the Government are making specific grants to support local authority expenditure of some £170 million for the implementation of the national curriculum. It is for local education authorities to apply for these grants, to identify needs and priorities and to direct spending towards them. However, £10 million of this total is earmarked for courses for teachers of maths and science in primary schools.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he is taking to increase the number of school laboratory technicians.

Mr. Fallon: Under local management of schools, the governing bodies of schools take their own decisions on staffing matters. The Government are confident that governors are best placed to take decisions including the appropriate deployment of resources between teaching and non-teaching staff, and the nature of the non-teaching staff to be appointed.

Speech Disorders

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children whose homes are in Scotland are being educated at specialist schools for children with speech and language disorders in England.

Mr. Fallon: This information is not collected centrally.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Service (Race Relations)

Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken to improve implementation of the prison service's race relations policies; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The prison service is committed to the elimination of racial discrimination in all aspects of its work. This is clearly set out in the service's public policy statement, which emphasises the need to treat all prisoners fairly and without discrimination.

In order to help ensure effective implementation of these policies, we are launching this week a race relations manual for use at all establishments. A copy is being placed in the Library.

The manual explains the service's race relations policies in detail, and their implications for the various areas of prison life. It gives practical advice on how to implement the policies, and enables establishments to audit their current performance. All establishments will be required to carry out the audit process, to draw up action plans to ensure that the policies are being implemented and to develop new initiatives and ideas.

The manual will be used primarily by each establishment's race relations management team, which reports to the governor. Governors and their area managers will maintain an oversight of progress. However, the manual emphasises the responsibilities of all staff to help to implement the service's policies. The manual will be available to all staff and prisoners.

Briefings for governing governors are taking place this week and will be introduced by the director general of the prison service. Training sessions have already been held for representatives from race relations management teams.

The prison service will also be introducing shortly a pack for use by establishments in delivering local race relations training and a pocketbook for staff.

We believe that these initiatives represent a major step forward in ensuring the elimination of discrimination in prisons. They demonstrate the determination of the prison service to ensure that all prisoners are treated fairly, with humanity and with respect.

Television (Listed Events)

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce the conclusion of his consultations with interested parties about possible changes to the list drawn up for the purposes of section 182 of the Broadcasting Act 1990.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Following consultation with broadcasters, the rights holders of the events concerned, the Sports Council and the Central Council of Physical Recreation I have drawn up a list including eight events. They are:

1. Cricket Test matches involving England
2. The Derby horse race
3. The FIFA World cup finals
4. The FA cup final.
5. The Grand National horse race
6. The Olympic games
7. The finals weekend of the Wimbledon tennis championships and any subsequent days if the championship overruns
8. Additionally in Scotland, the Scottish FA cup final.

The Commonwealth games when held in the United Kingdom and the Oxford and Cambridge boat race have both been removed from the list, as have all but the finals weekend of the Wimbledon tennis championships.

Visa Nationals

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has reviewed the arrangements for visa nationals who travel abroad and return during a period of leave in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: At present, a visa national who intends to leave the United Kingdom for a visit abroad and then to return before the expiry of his current leave can obtain a re-entry visa from the Home Office. However, because re-entry visas are issued without substantive consideration of applications, they do not contribute to immigration control and I am not satisfied that they represent an effective use of resources. Furthermore, because returning visitors are eligible to receive a fresh six months' leave on each admission, a visa national can in theory prolong a visit indefinitely and without effective scrutiny through repeated use of re-entry visas. I have therefore decided that re-entry visas will no longer be issued with effect from 16 May 1991 and that alternative arrangements should be made.

In recent years it has been the practice, when introducing a new visa regime, to provide an exemption for visa nationals who are settled here or have been admitted for work, study or other long-term purposes. The visa exemption scheme, currently limited to 11 visa nationalities, is functioning satisfactorily and there is no longer any reason why its scope should remain confined in this way. I am therefore laying before Parliament today immigration rules changes to extend the scheme to all visa nationalities. From 16 May any visa national who is settled here and returns after an absence of not more than two years, or has been granted a limited leave of more than six months and returns before the expiry date of that leave, will benefit from the exemption.

Visitors will remain outside the scope of the exemption scheme. However, in order to provide increased flexibility for those who plan to travel abroad and return during a visit, my right hon. Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary has decided to introduce on 16 May a new multiple entry visa valid for six months. This will replace and carry the same charge as the existing six month double entry visa. The existing two year and five year multiple entry visas will remain available.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Trade Statistics

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will provide a table showing, for each calendar year from 1970 to 1990 inclusive, (a) the non-oil current account surplus or deficit, (b) non-oil money GDP, (c) (a) above as a percentage of (b) above;

(2) if he will publish a table showing, for each year from 1970 to 1990 inclusive, plus the Budget forecast for 1991, the non-oil current account surplus or deficit expressed as a percentage of non-oil GDP.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The annual values for the years 1970 to 1990 of the current account balance less the balance of trade in oil are shown in the table, together with these current balance values expressed as a percentage of non-North sea gross domestic product. Non-North sea GDP is not published as a separate series. There is no standard definition of the non-oil current balance; the measure shown here does not take account of the full impact of the oil industry, nor would it be feasible to do so.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Farm Prices

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on farm prices for the current year.

Mr. Curry: Negotiations are continuing on the European Commission's proposals for agricultural prices for the 1991-92 marketing years; the Agriculture Council next meets on 22 and 23 April.

Brucellosis

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in how many herds of cattle brucellosis has been identified in the current year; how many heads of cattle have been destroyed; what is the basis of compensation for cattle killed as a result of this identification of brucellosis; and if he will make a statement on the extent of brucellosis and the measures taken to curtail it.

Mr. Maclean: In Great Britain, no case of brucellosis has been confirmed this year and so far one animal has been slaughtered as a reactor. In Northern Ireland, brucellosis has been confirmed in two herds, and 36 reactors and 196 contact animals have been slaughtered.

Compensation for reactors is paid at 75 per cent. of market value, subject to a ceiling.

The United Kingdom is officially brucellosis free under community criteria, and qualifies for blood testing to be carried out only every two years.

PRIME MINISTER

Correspondence

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Prime Minister when he will be replying to the letter of 19 March from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North on the subject of the campaign for non-payment of the poll tax by a prospective parliamentary candidate.

The Prime Minister: A reply to the hon. Member has been sent today.

WALES

Rents

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average time taken by the rent officer service for Wales to deal with applications made to them under (a) section 70 of the Rent Act 1977 and (b) section 121 of the Housing Act 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what increase there has been in personnel employed in the rent officer service in Wales since the introduction of the Housing Act 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Fifteen.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Authorities

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is now able to dissolve the English residuary water authorities.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend has today dissolved by order the residuary Anglian, Northumbrian, North West, Severn-Trent, Wessex and Yorkshire water authorities. He will dissolve the remaining authorities as soon as they have discharged their functions.

Gulf Oil Pollution

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the report by the head of the meteorological research flight on the Hercules flight through the smoke plume in the Gulf.

(2) what has been the assessment of the meteorological research flight in relation to (a) hydrogen sulphide, (b) carbon monoxide, (c) carbon dioxide, (d) sulphur dioxide, (e) nitrogen compounds and (f) combinations of hydrocarbons and chlorine in the smoke plumes in the Gulf; and what was the finding of particles of aerosol per cubic metre.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 15 April, Official Report, Vol. 189, columns 65-66, and to the related documents which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations have been received from Iran about oil-black rain and oil-black snow.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 28 March, Official Report, columns 538-39, to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), what interim assessments he has had from the United Nations Environment Programme for a comprehensive assessment of environmental damage in the Gulf.

Mr. Baldry: None so far. I understand that implementation of the 90-day programme for the comprehensive assessment proposed by UNEP has now begun, but it is too early to make a substantive report on progress.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when local authorities are to be compensated in respect of the statutory reduction of community charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: A new grant is to be paid to local authorities to reimburse them for the loss of community charge income arising from the provisions of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act 1991. Payment of this grant will be made in 10 monthly instalments of 9 per cent. commencing in April on the basis of an estimate of the income forgone by each authority. Final grant entitlement will be calculated after the end of the financial year 1991-92. Parliamentary approval of this new service will be sought in a supplementary estimate for the relevant vote, class VIII, vote 14. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure (estimated at £435 million for the grant payments to be made in April) will be met by a repayable advance from the contingencies fund.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of (a) the total costs of administration of the community charge in England in 1990-91 and (b) the costs of the administration of the rates in 1989-90.

Mr. Key [holding answer 16 April 1991]: Local authorities budgeted to spend £440 million on the administration of the community charge in 1990-91. This compares with £200 million for the collection of both domestic and non-domestic rates.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the average reduction in 1991-92 in community charges resulting from the provisions of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Bill for all those entitled to a reduction under the community charge reduction scheme prior to the enactment of the Bill.

Mr. Key [holding answer 15 April 1991]: Following the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act and the improvements to the community charge reduction scheme, the average reduction in net charge payable after community charge benefit in England, for those who were previously within the scope of the community charge reduction scheme as already planned for 1991-92, is estimated at £86. For those with no entitlement to community charge benefit the average reduction is estimated at £113.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many community charge payers he estimates will benefit, net of rebates and the community charge reduction scheme, from the provisions of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Bill by (a) £140, (b) £120 to £140, (c) £100 to £120, (d) £80 to £100 and (e) less than £80; and in each case, how many are (i) pensioners and (ii) income support recipients.

Mr. Key [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The Community Charges (General Reduction) Act 1991 provides for headline community charges everywhere to be reduced by £140, or to zero where the charge set is less than that figure. About 20 million chargepayers in England will additionally receive help from the community charge reduction scheme and/or through community charge benefit.

Both the community charge reduction scheme and community charge benefit help people meet their headline community charges and reduce the amount falling to be paid. The community charge reduction scheme limits increases between 1989-90 rates and community charge liabilities in 1991-92. Community charge benefit helps those with low incomes. It follows that when the headline charge is reduced, the amount of help a person needs to meet the headline charge is also reduced.

For example, a person on income support would only have to pay 20 per cent. of the community charge as reduced by £140 and any entitlement under the community charge reduction scheme, CCRS. If their original charge was £400, and if there were no entitlement to CCRS, the charge after benefit would have been £80; after the £140 reduction the headline charge is £260 and the charge payable is £52. The 35 per cent. reduction in net charge is the same as the percentage reduction in headline charge.

The information requested is given in the table below:

Reduction in payment per year	Charge payers (millions)	Pensioners (millions)
(a) £140 plus	14·2	1·9
(b) £120 to £139·99	1·7	0·2
(c) £100 to £119·99	2·2	0·3
(d) £80 to £99·99	2·9	0·5
(e) less than £80	14·6	5·0

All 4 million individuals in England on income support are entitled to maximum community charge benefit and hence fall in category (e) in the above table.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what he estimates the average community charge will be in England in 1991-92 (a) before the effects of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Bill and (b) after the reduction provided for in the Bill, in both cases giving figures (i) gross of the community charge reduction scheme and rebates, (ii) net of the community charge reduction scheme but gross of rebates and (iii) net of the community charge reduction scheme and rebates.

Mr. Key [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The information requested is as follows:

(a) Before Community Charges (General Reduction) Act
(i) Average charge (gross)	392
(ii) Average charge less community charge reduction scheme	340
(iii) Average charge less community charge reduction scheme and community charge benefit	285
(b) After Community Charges (General Reduction) Act and revision to community charge reduction scheme
(i) Average charge (gross)	252
(ii) Average charge less community charge reduction scheme	220
(iii) Average charge less community charge reduction scheme and community charge benefit	187

Taking account of the allowance in income support for the 20 per cent. minimum contribution, the estimated average charge in England is reduced to less than £175. Charges have been calculated without allowing for reduction in charges due to capping.

Concrete Batching Plant, London N19

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to make a decision on the inspectors' report into a planning application for a concrete batching plant at Monnery road, London N19; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: A decision is expected shortly.

The Gulf

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement on action being taken to end environmental destruction in the Gulf region.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 16 April 1991]: I listed the actions which the United Kingdom had taken to help alleviate the effects of oil pollution in the Gulf in my reply to the motion tabled by the hon. Member for Linlithgow on 15 March, Official Report, Vol. 187, columns 1384-91. Since then, the Government have continued to respond positively to requests for assistance from the Gulf states. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was accompanied on his recent visit to Kuwait by a team of experts to advise on the capabilities which United Kingdom industry could offer for extinguishing oil fires and capping the wells. The Government are also making available to the Gulf states an assessment of the health and environment effects of those fires. In relation to the coastal oil slick, part of the £1 million which the United Kingdom has contributed to the International Maritime Organisation is being deployed to clean up Karan island, a key Gulf breeding site for green turtles.

Homelessness

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's estimate of the number of homeless people on 1 January of each year since 1981 who are sleeping in (a) bed and breakfast accommodation, (b) hostels and (c) other temporary accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 16 April 1991]: Information on homeless households for whom local authorities have accepted a statutory duty to secure accommodation under the homelessness provisions of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 and the Housing Act 1985 is reported quarterly to the Department.

Estimates of the number of such households, including some on whom inquiries had not yet been completed, in each type of temporary accommodation at 31 December of each year since 1980 are as follows:

	Bed and breakfast	Hostels[1]	Other
1980	1,330	3,380	..
1981	1,520	3,320	..
1982	1,640	3,500	4,200
1983	2,700	3,400	3,740
1984	3,670	3,990	4,640
1985	5,360	4,730	5,830
1986	8,990	4,610	7,190
1987	10,370	5,150	9,240
1988	10,970	6,240	12,890
1989	11,480	8,020	18,400
1990	11,130	9,010	25,030

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

West Bank

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Israeli Government about plans to build new housing units for Israeli settlers in the occupied Palestinian west bank.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We continue to make very clear to the Israelis that we oppose all such activity. Israeli settlements in the occupied territories, including east Jerusalem, are in our view illegal and an obstacle to the search for peace.

Kurds

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance has been given to Turkey to alleviate the problem of Kurdish refugees from Iraq; what assistance has been given to the Kurds within Iraq; and if he will make a statement on the plight of the Kurdish people of Iraq.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have contributed £20 million in response to the United Nations and other international appeals for help to Iraqui refugees. This money is for use in Turkey, Iran and Iraq and other affected countries. We have also contributed three Hercules aircraft and nine Chinook helicopters to assist with the delivery of relief supplies. This is at a cost of some £1 million per week.

We remain concerned at the plight of the Iraqi refugees and determined to play our full part in meeting their needs.

China

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the question of human rights was discussed at his recent meeting in Peking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs raised the subject of human rights, and in particular the present situation in Tibet, with both Mr. Qian Qichen, the Chinese Foreign Minister, and Mr. Jiang Zemin, the General Secretary. He referred to a list of cases of particular concern compiled by Amnesty International. We have made regular representations to the Chinese authorities, both bilaterally and with our EC partners, about reported human rights abuses in China.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken concerning the imprisonment of Catholic priests and clergy of other denominations in China at the most recent date.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We regularly make representations to the Chinese about these matters. EC ambassadors in Peking made a demarche on this subject last year and my hon. Friend the then Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs also raised it on his visit to Peking in July last year.

On his recent visit to Peking, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs reminded the Chinese authorities of our general concern about reports of human rights abuses. He referred to a list of cases of particular concern, which included a number of people imprisoned for their religious beliefs.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the question of religious freedom in Hong Kong after the handover to China in 1997 was discussed during his recent visit to Peking.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: This question did not arise during the recent discussions that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs had with the Chinese Government. The Sino-British joint declaration and the Basic Law both make provision for the continuation of freedom of religious belief and practice in Hong Kong after 1997. In addition, the international covenant on civil and political rights, article 18 of which covers religious freedom, will, under the joint declaration and Basic Law, continue to apply to Hong Kong after 1997.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to China.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) on 15 April, in Official Report, Vol. 189, columns 111-12.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what considerations persuaded the coalition to allow Iraq to use helicopter gunships after the peace treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: At the meeting between General Schwarzkopf and the Iraqi military authorities on 3 March on the suspension of hostilities, the use of fixed wing combat aircraft by Iraq was prohibited. No limitation was placed on the use of helicopters.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Africa

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will raise in the European Community the special need for additional funds for emergency relief in Africa.

I also announced at the beginning of this week an additional £30 million of non-food emergency and relief assistance in Africa. The need for additional funds for Africa was discussed by EC Foreign Ministers on 15 April, and detailed proposals are expected to be agreed soon.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Income (Statistics)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what will be the net income after the Budget proposals have come into effect (i) after housing costs of a married man with children aged 13 to 16 years earning (a) £104 and (b) £105 per week, (ii) of a married man with children aged three, eight and 11 years paying average rent and rates as used in the tax benefit model tables earning (a) £65 per week and (b) £80 per week, (iii) after benefits of a married man with children aged four and six years earning (a) £60 per week gross and (b) £140 per week gross (iv) under current tax and benefit structure of a married man with children aged three, eight and 11 years with gross earnings of (a) £65 per week and (b) £105 per week and (v) under the current tax and benefit structure of a married man with children aged four and six years earning (a) £80 per week and (b) £90 per week.

Mr. Jack: The information is set out in the tables. All assumptions are as set out in the published tax-benefit model tables. For the purposes of these examples, it has been assumed that housing costs remain static irrespective of the level of gross earnings. Each family is assumed to live in council property appropriate to its size and to pay estimated average rent and community charge. Total net income is the product of the interaction of income-related benefits and the tax system at any given level of gross earnings. In the tables relating to the situation after the Budget proposals have come into effect, average rents are provisional 1991-92 figures and community charge has been assessed at £250 per annum. Any relevant changes announced in the Budget, including the increase in child benefit which will take effect in October, have also been incorporated. Those relating to the situation before the Budget use benefit rates in force before the April uprating.

It should be noted that the results in the tables remain arbitrary. They cannot reflect, except by chance, the actual circumstances of particular people and cannot claim to be representative of the population at large. The tables use hypothetical rents so they do not reflect the full range of housing costs which people can pay.

The information is as follows:

Tables (i) to (iii)—post Budget

Gross earnings (£pw)	Net income after rent and community charge (£pw)

Child Allowances

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will explain, as precisely as the information available permits, how the 1977 upratings of child dependency increases and war widows' children's allowances, respectively, were calculated; and what amounts were paid out in respect of these allowances in 1977 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Jack: In November 1977 the rates of child dependency increases of benefit for the first child in a family and war widows' children's allowance were increased by 14·5 per cent. in line with the general up-rating of long-term benefits. The rates of child dependency increases for the second and any subsequent child in a family were calculated by reducing the rate payable for the first child by the 50p differential between the rate of child benefit payable for the first child and that payable for any other child.

On the basis of the information available, expenditure on child dependency increases of benefit in the financial year 1977-78 is estimated to have been in the region of £230 million, of which about £90 million was for child dependency increases of short-term benefits. Since 1984, child dependency increases of short-term benefits have been payable only where the beneficiary has reached state pension age. Equivalent expenditure in the last financial year, 1990-91, is estimated to have been £158 million. Information on expenditure on war widows' children's allowances is not available as no records were kept of the numbers receiving the two levels of allowance then payable; expenditure in 1990-91 was about £1·7 million.

Social Fund

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the cash limits of the social fund for 1991-92 applied to the Peterlee and Seaham offices for 1991-92 and the estimated expenditure on discretionary grants and loans for 1990-91.

Mr. Scott: Details of the district office budget allocations for 1991-92 and monthly local office expenditure up to February 1991, the latest figures available, are in the Library.

Expenditure

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the level of expenditure on social security each year since 1979, both in cash terms and at 1990-91 prices, excluding expenditure on unemployment benefit, income support for the unemployed and their families and other expenditure on the unemployed; and what has been the percentage change in real terms each year and cumulatively.

Miss Widdecombe: Details of total social security spending from 1978-79 to 1990-91, excluding the amount spent on unemployed people, are given in the table. The table is as follows:

	Expenditure £ million

The comparable information for 1992-93 and 1993-94 will not be available until local authorities have submitted their budget estimates for those years.

Full account has been taken in successive aggregate external finance settlements of the costs incurred by local authorities in collecting both the community charge and non-domestic rates.

Except for those tenants whose new landlord is a fully mutual co-operative housing association, tenants will have a contractual right to buy their home. This would become a statutory right to buy, after the coming into force of regulations, in terms of section 81A of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987, which I expect soon to be laid before this House.

In addition, the terms of the new tenancy would be those agreed in advance of transfer and would have been made available to the tenants for their consultation process prior to the ballot taking place.

I understand that the figures for military deaths from other coalition countries during the operation were as follows:

	Number
(a) United States	142
(b) Kuwait	One
(c) Other coalition countries	51

As at 16 April, the United States also had five personnel still listed as missing. I understand that it is estimated that about 1,300 Kuwaitis were killed in the first three days following Iraq's invasion and about 1,700 subsequently. We have no authoritative information on civilian casualties suffered by other coalition countries, nor on military or civilian casualties sustained by Iraq or by other countries outside the coalition.

Obstetric Services

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what resident paediatric support exists for the obstetric units at the Royal maternity hospital, the Mater hospital and the City hospital, Belfast.

Mr. Hanley: Resident paediatric support for the obstetric units at the Royal maternity hospital, the Mater hospital and the Belfast city hospital is provided at two levels. Registrars are based at the Royal maternity and the Belfast city hospitals and combine with a registrar at the Royal Belfast hospital for sick children to provide a one in three rota for all three obstetric units. This means that a registrar is on call one night in three and one weekend in three. At senior house officer level, two senior house officers in the Belfast city hospital combine with two in the Royal Belfast hospital for sick children to provide a one in four rota for the Belfast city hospital and the Mater. The Royal maternity hospital has four resident senior house officers who between them provide 24 hour cover.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many deliveries were recorded in 1989 in the obstetric units of the Royal maternity hospital, the Mater hospital and the City hospital, Belfast.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the current rota for obstetric staff at the Royal maternity hospital, the Mater hospital and the City hospital, Belfast;

(2) how many consultant obstetricians and consultant gynaecologists are currently employed at the Royal maternity hospital, the Mater hospital and the City hospital, Belfast.

Mr. Hanley: Eleven consultant obstetricians and gynaecologists are employed in the Mater hospital, Belfast city hospital and royal group of hospitals, including the royal maternity and the royal Victoria hospitals. These consultants provide 24-hour cover to the hospitals concerned.

A rota indicates the degree to which a doctor is on call outside his normal working week. For example a 1:3 rota means that he is on call one night in three and one weekend in three. The term is normally used in relation to junior doctors. Details of the current rota for junior doctors at the hospitals are set out below.

	Rota
Royal Victoria hospital
Senior registrars and registrars	1 in 4
Senior house officers	1 in 4
House officers	1 in 3
Belfast city hospital
Senior registrars and registrars	1 in 4
Senior house officers	1 in 4
Mater hospital
Registrars	1 in 2
Senior house officers	1 in 3

Milk

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the quantity of milk produced in the year ending 31 March 1991; what was the relevant quota for milk production; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Wholesale milk production in Northern Ireland in the year ending 31 March 1991 is provisionally calculated to have been 1,285·950 million litres. This volume will be adjusted to take account of its butterfat content. The final wholesale production figure will not be known for some time. Wholesale quota for the Province is 1,285·628 million litres. This figure may be increased by the addition of any unused direct sales quota. Direct sales quota is 5·6 million litres. Direct sales production will not be known until final returns have been received from direct sellers.

Industrial Development Board

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total expenditure of the Industrial development board in (a) Germany, (b) the United States, (c) South Korea and (d) Japan in each of the past five years.

Because of changes in IDB's accounting methods, comparable information for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost per job to be provided to the industrial development board in each of the past two years for jobs provided by firms from (a) Germany, (b) the United States, (c) South Korea and (d) Japan.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as follows:

	Cost per job (£s)

Mr. Hanley: Four cases of infectious bovine rhino-tracheitis in cattle have been reported to the Department of Agriculture in the past six months. The occurrences were as follows:

	Number
October 1990	Nil
November 1990	1
December 1990	2

In each case, the Department of Agriculture has taken the appropriate control measures.

Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those grants under the physical and social environment programme which have been allocated to (a) Irish cultural activities and (b) British cultural activities; if both sections of the community are benefiting from this programme; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The physical and social environment programme makes provision for a sub-programme under the broad heading of community reconciliation. The overall aim of the sub-programme is to encourage greater mutual understanding and respect for different cultural traditions, and to promote greater contact between the different communities in Northern Ireland. Within the sub-programme there are five measures:

Cross-community contact
Community relations council
Cultural traditions
District councils
Education

The programme is for the period up to December 1993 with European regional development fund support of £9 million towards gross expenditure of £12 million.

The four projects which have so far received funding are:

Project	Grant £	Measure

Newcastle Disease

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the level of compensation being provided for those who have had flocks of poultry destroyed as a result of the recent outbreak of Newcastle disease.

Mr. Hanley: Schedule 2 to the Disease of Animals Order (Northern Ireland) 1981 provides for compensation for flockowners in the case of Newcastle disease. The rate is at the value of the birds immediately before slaughter. Compensation is also paid for any eggs or feed which have to be destroyed. Provision is made for those flockowners who are dissatisfied with the amount of compensation offered to have recourse to independent valuation.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many poultry flocks have been affected by Newcastle disease since 1 April; what is the source of the present outbreak; what precautions have been taken against the spread of Newcastle disease; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Newcastle disease has been confirmed in one poultry flock since 1 April 1991.

Epidemiological investigations are continuing but the available evidence indicates that the source of the outbreak was contaminated feed.

The Department of Agriculture in accordance with EC and domestic legislation impress restrictions on the movement of all poultry, poultrymeat and eggs in a 10km zone around infected areas.

After consultation with the poultry and compound feedingstuffs industries, the Department introduced regulations requiring all poultry rations to be heat-treated, or until 31 August 1991 handled through closed systems, so as to minimise the risk of contamination. Heat treatment of feedstuffs is the most secure means of preventing the spread of infection from this source. The Department has issued advice to poultry producers on how to prevent infection, the symptoms to look out for and the need to report promptly any suspicion of disease.

Civil Service

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were employed in the non-industrial civil service in each district council area, as at 1 April in each year from 1985 to 1991.

Next Steps Initiative

Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has identified any further candidates for agency status under the "next steps" initiative within his Department.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following a detailed feasibility study, I have identified my Department's medicines control agency as a candidate for executive agency status.

I am confident that the move to agency status will be beneficial enabling the agency to operate with greater freedom and clearer responsibility within an agreed framework of objectives, performance targets and resources, thus enhancing the agency's ability to safeguard public health through the control of medicines.

Detailed discussions on an agency framework document have been set in hand with a view to establishing the medicines control agency as an executive agency in 1991.

I will be considering other candidates for agency status in due course.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number of persons currently on waiting lists for hospital in-patient treatment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [pursuant to her reply, 16 April 1991]: The new figures for 30 September 1990 show that 705,706 patients were waiting for in-patient treatment, excluding those who had asked for their admission to be deferred, a 1 per cent. reduction since March 1990. The number waiting over a year for treatment fell by 2 per cent. in the six months to September 1990. This is on top of the 9 per cent. reduction in the previous 12 months. Provisional figures show the downward trend is gaining momentum, with a 12 per cent. reduction expected in the five months to February this year.

PRIME MINISTER

Overseas Aid

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister when the United Kingdom first agreed to give official overseas aid equivalent to 0·7 per cent. of annual income; and if he will list the amount in real terms and the percentage for each year since then.

The Prime Minister: The United Nations target for official development assistance to developing countries of 0·7 per cent. of GNP was accepted in principle by the British Government in 1974, although no date was set for meeting it. The United Kingdom has provided net official development assistance since then as follows:

Year	Net official development assistance £ million (1989 prices)	Official development assistance as percentage of GNP
1974	1,348	0·36
1975	1,395	0·38

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday April 18.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

East Timor

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister, further to his answer of 18 March, Official Report, columns 3-4, on what considerations the Government based their decision not to recognise East Timor's right to self-determination.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom supported United Nations Security Council resolution 389 of 22 April 1976 which confirmed the right of the people of East Timor to self-determination. Since 1982 the United Kingdom, in company with most other member states of the European Community, has supported the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General to promote discussions between Indonesia and Portugal with a view to reaching a solution acceptable to all parties.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister, further to his answer of 18 March, Official Report, columns 3-4, what guarantees he has received or what monitoring has been undertaken to ensure that Tornados sold to Indonesia have not and will not be used against the civil population of East Timor.

The Prime Minister: There has been no sale of Tornado to Indonesia.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister what the Government are doing to promote United Nations resolution 35/27 of 1980 on East Timor's right to independence.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom abstained on United Nations resolution 35/27 of 1980. We took the view that by so doing, in company with most European Community partners and others, we could help to promote reconciliation and the search for a diplomatic solution by Indonesia and Portugal. Since 1982, the United Kingdom has supported the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General to find a solution to the problem which is acceptable to all parties.

Indonesia

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister, further to his answer of 18 March, Official Report, columns 3-4, on what consideration the Government based their decision to recognise the right of Indonesia to self-determination.

The Prime Minister: My earlier reply referred to the right of self-defence under international law. All states have the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Paul Holmes

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations have been received from the Irish Prisoners' Support Group concerning prisoner Paul Holmes; what reply has been sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Irish Prisoners' Support Group has written a number of letters referring to Mr. Holmes's request for a transfer to a prison in Northern Ireland. The most recent was on 25 January. A reply was sent on 14 March explaining the criteria under which Mr. Holmes's request was refused.

Bedding Material

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 19 March, Official Report, column 70, what is the reason for the increase in the second half of the 1980s in the percentage of incidents, involving children injured in fires related to bedding, where the outcome was the death of the child.

Mr. John Patten: The available information given in the following table suggests the main source and cause is playing with matches. However, the number of deaths are relatively small and subject to considerable year to year variation, making the interpretation of any changes difficult.

Prison Education Departments

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a table for England and for each region in England, giving actual expenditure on prison education departments, and expenditure required by these departments, for each year from 1986-87 to 1990-91, and their plans for 1991-92, and 1992-93, in current prices, in constant prices, and an index of constant price expenditure where 1986-87 = 100.

Mrs. Rumbold: The table shows the information available. It relates to England and Wales. A regional breakdown is available only up to 1990-91 when the Prison Service was reorganised. The information relating to 1991-92 and 1992-93 is therefore presented in totals. The table shows expenditure on teaching services and education materials.

Working Visas

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what discussions he has had about the future of the two-year working visa for Commonwealth citizens with (a) New Zealand and (b) Australia; and what representations he has received from each Government on the issue;

(2) what proposals he has for the future of the two-year working visa for Commonwealth citizens after 1992.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no present plans to amend the working holidaymaker arrangements for young Commonwealth citizens set out in paragraph 37 of the "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules"—HC251. No recent discussions on the future of this scheme have taken place with either the New Zealand or Australian Government; nor have they made representations to us about this subject.

Rape

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library guidelines issued to the courts dealing with rape cases regarding sentencing and the relevant factors to be taken into account.

Mr. John Patten: Guidance was given by the Court of Appeal in R v. Billam (1986). The judgment is in the All England Law Reports for 1986, a copy of which is in the Library.

Fire Brigades

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which fire brigades have not yet fully implemented Home Office technical bulletin 1/89; and if he will give the time scale for implementation for each fire authority.

Mr. John Patten: We are satisfied that all fire brigades in England and Wales have adopted the principal features of the guidance on breathing apparatus contained in Home Office technical bulletin 1/1989.

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what items of equipment, and at what cost, Kent fire brigade has purchased for use solely for firefighting and rescue in the channel tunnel and its associated sites;

(2) what contributions have been made by Eurotunnel Ltd. and Transmanche Ltd. to Kent county council for equipment provided by Kent fire brigade for training, firefighting and rescue in the channel tunnel and its associated sites;

(3) what provisions in terms of (a) staff and (b) equipment and at what financial cost have been made by Kent fire brigade in order that they may fulfil firefighting and rescue commitments in the channel tunnel and associated sites.

Mr. John Patten: Kent fire brigade has provided six uniformed and one civilian staff for channel tunnel site liaison and specialised training during the construction phase at a cost of £141,500, and 24 additional posts at a cost of £399,100 to maintain manning levels on fire appliances in the absence of those undertaking training. Equipment purchased specifically to meet its commitments consists of 40 long-duration breathing apparatus sets, and personal protective clothing, heavy duty lifting jacks and cutting tools at a cost of £565,600. Total contributions made by Eurotunnel plc to Kent county council amount to £628,400 to date, in accordance with the statements made by the concessionaries to the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Bill.

Victims Charter

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department from which organisations he has received comments on the "Victims Charter", published by his Department on 22 February 1990; and if he has plans to issue a revised edition in the light of such comments.

Mr. John Patten: Comments on the charter were received from the following bodies:

Victim Support
Council of Her Majesty's Circuit Judges
Justices' Clerks' Society
Lord Chancellor's Department
Crown Prosecution Service
Metropolitan Police
Hampshire Constabulary
Staffordshire Police
Association of Chief Officers of Probation
Northumbria Probation Service
Merseyside Probation Service.

Many of the standards of service set out in the charter for the criminal justice agencies are already being met. Others are under discussion with the agencies concerned with a view to implementation as soon as practicable.

Firefighters

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many operational (a) men and (b) women firefighters are employed in each fire authority/FCDA in England.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is given in the table.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which fire brigades have yet to provide full A26 specification firefighting uniforms to all (a) whole-time and (b) retained firefighters; and if he will give the timescale for issue to (a) and (b) and the estimated cost for each fire authority.

Mr. John Patten: The purchase of firefighters' uniforms is a matter entirely for fire authorities. A recent survey indicated that 33 fire brigades in England and Wales issue firefighting tunics providing protection to specification A26.

TRANSPORT

Vehicle Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce regulations to ensure that cars are designed to better standards in respect of their vulnerability to theft.

Mr. Chope: My Department is pressing for the adoption, as a European Community directive, of requirements for mechanical locking systems in passenger cars, as contained in British Standard AU 209 part 1. We are also supporting an international standard on motor vehicle alarms which could when completed form the basis of another EC directive. We hope to incorporate the provisions of such directives in national regulations at the earliest opportunity. In addition, we are pressing vehicle manufacturers to improve car security by voluntary means without waiting for regulation. During national crime prevention week we are emphasising that there is ample scope for improvement here.

Public Transport (Safety)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps he is taking to improve the safety of mainline railway stations in the light of recent terrorist bomb attacks;

(2) if he will introduce measures to make the physical environment of coach, bus and railway stations safer in the event of terrorist bomb attacks.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail is responsible for the safety of mainline railway stations, and has taken a number of steps to improve security measures following the explosion at Victoria. These include a heightened police presence, the withdrawal of left luggage locker facilities, removal of litter bins, sealing of letter boxes and more regular cleaning of station concourses. Security at bus and coach stations is the responsibility of the owner and operators, and increased security measures again include a heightened police presence. Continuing vigilance by both staff and passengers is also vital, and regular reminders are issued by operators about suspicious packages.

Vehicle Safety and Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce regulations to improve the safety and security of vehicles by stipulating higher standards of glass in cars.

Mr. Chope: A proposal for a European Community directive which requires windscreens to be made of laminated glass is being considered in the Council of Ministers. If this is adopted, it will be included in our national type approval requirements for new vehicle models and will eventually apply to all new vehicles.

Work is in hand for a British standards code of practice on windscreen glass repair which may be incorporated into the MOT test.

Although laminated glass may improve vehicle security, we are not intending to require it for other windows because it can increase the risk of entrapment in a vehicle following an accident. We are, however, pressing for agreement in the European Community on other measures for improving vehicle security.

Motorways (Lighting)

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether his Department makes comparisons of accident statistics on lit and unlit sections of Britain's motorways;

(2) what recent studies his Department has engaged in regarding the effect on accident statistics of lighting Britain's motorways.

Mr. Chope: A study by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory "Light on Motorway Accident Rates" was published in 1987. Accident statistics are continually monitored, including comparisons of lit and unlit sections of motorways.

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received over the past three years in support of the lighting of Britain's motorway networks.

Mr. Chope: Those who have made representations over the past three years include the National Chamber of Trade, the editor of the Sunday Mercury, various Members of Parliament, a small number of police authorities and individual members of the public. We also receive representations against further lighting of the motorway network from other interested parties.

A14

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to let the contract for each of the remaining stages of the A14 in Northamptonshire and Cambridgeshire.

Mr. Chope: All remaining contracts are programmed to be let by the end of the year.

Cyclists

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if pedal cyclists are part of the London area transport survey currently being undertaken by his Department.

Mr. Chope: Yes. Pedal cyclists are being covered in both major components of the 1991 London area transport survey. The household survey includes questions about the ownership of cycles and the use made of them and the roadside surveys treat cycles as a separate vehicle category.

M1 (Tourist Signs)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many tourist signs are located on the M1 motorway between Leeds and exit 34; and which tourist attractions they relate to.

Mr. Chope: There are four tourist signs on the M1 motorway between Leeds and exit 34; two northbound and two southbound at junction 38, relating to the Yorkshire sculpture park.

Archway Road, London

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many properties on the line of the abandoned A1 Archway road widening scheme are owned by his Department; and what plans he has to sell them.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 16 April 1991]: The Department owns 54 dwellings including some flats and 24 business premises. We are currently considering a proposal from the Archway Road tenants association for the purchase of the residential units. We are also arranging to dispose of the business premises as soon as possible.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) by what date at the rate currently envisaged for 1992 under the current assumptions indicated in the oral statement by the Minister of State, Official Report, 14 January, column 644, payment for the Severn bridge will be completed; and what annual toll income would be in the final year at constant prices;

(2) on the basis of current assumptions about traffic growth on the second Severn bridge and toll levels for 1992 indicated in the oral statement by the Minister of State on 14 January, Official Report, column 644, what at constant prices, is the forecast annual income from tolls for each year from 1992 until the bridge is paid for.

Mr. Chope [pursuant to his answer, 15 April 1991, c. 2-3]: The costs of the two Severn bridges, including the outstanding deficit on the existing Severn bridge, are due to be paid by the end of the concessionaire's tolling period.

If the concession begins on 1 January 1992, then, on the basis of the concessionaire's traffic forecasts and the tolling regime for 1992 and subsequent years set out in the Severn Bridges Bill, it would end on 30 June 2013.

On these assumptions, the concessionaire's forecast toll revenues, in 1989 prices, are as follows:

	£ million
1992	29·6
1993	32·4
1994	35·4
1995	38·8
1996	39·7

2003	46·6
2004	47·6
2005	48·7
2006	49·7
2007	50·8
2008	51·8

2010	54·0
2011	55·1
2012	56·2

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Leicester Schools

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether he will make it his policy to collect data on the number of pupils attending schools in a different district from their home within the same local education authority;

(2) what is his policy on securing equitable funding arrangements for schools such as Bushloe high school, Wigston Magna, Leicestershire which draw a high proportion of pupils from outside their catchment areas;

(3) what assessment he has made of the effect of Leicestershire county council's formula for funding schools on the loss of teachers for schools such as Bushloe high school in the Oadby and Wigston area; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what representations he has received about the effect of local management of schools on the number of teachers at Bushloe high school, Wigston Magna, Leicestershire;

(5) if he will now list the budget allocation per unit for local management of schools in (a) Wigston, (b) South Wigston and (c) Oadby; what is the average budget allocation per unit for schools in the city of Leicester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: I refer my hon. Friend to my replies of 22 March and 17 April, Official Report, columns 234 and 137. Under local management, schools are funded principally on the basis of the numbers and ages of pupils on roll. Schools are not penalised for attracting pupils from outside the home local education authority; they receive funds in respect of those pupils through the LMS formula. In this way pupils of the same age are funded at the same level, irrespective of where they live and which school they attend within the authority.

We have received a small number of representations from schools in Leicestershire which serve the 10 to 14 age range, including Bushloe high school.

I shall write to my hon. Friend to explain the situation in more detail.

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning opting out of schools in the Oadby, Wigston and South Wigston areas in view of the underfunding of schools which draw up to a quarter of their pupils from outside their catchment areas.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend's predecessor received a number of representations from schools in these areas, some of which referred to the possibility of seeking grant-maintained status.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what research is being undertaken into the effect of the summer heat in Kuwait turning oil lakes into tar, hampering plans to suck oil into tankers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: None of the research councils is currently undertaking any research in this area.

Official Visits

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report the official visits he has made since his appointment to schools, sixth-form colleges, further education colleges, universities, polytechnics and other educational establishments, with the dates, name of the establishment, its area and the purpose of the visits, in each case.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My official visits have been as follows:

26 November 1990:
Ribston Hall GM Grammar school
(Gloucestershire)

30 January 1991:
Stockingford First school
Stockingford Middle school
Alderman Smith High school (Warwickshire)

8 April 1991:
The Open University
(Buckinghamshire)

I have also made informal and political visits to universities and colleges, and attended conferences and meetings with teachers and lecturers.

Planned official visits to LEA-maintained schools in Gloucestershire and Lancashire were cancelled at a late stage due to urgent ministerial business. My plans before the end of the summer term include visits to maintained schools and PE colleges in the following local education authorities: Cambridgeshire, Camden, Devon, Essex, Hereford and Worcester, Kent, Liverpool, Northamptonshire, Nottinghamshire and Sheffield; to two GM schools; to one CTC; to colleges of the universities of Oxford and London, and to the university of Nottingham; and to the polytechnics of Liverpool and Sheffield.

Foundation for Sport and the Arts

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in full the organisations with which Ministers or officials in his Department plan to hold meetings with regard to establishing the proposed Foundation for Sport and the Arts; and on what dates such meetings will take place.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend and the Minister for Sport are due to meet the Financial Secretary to the Treasury on 24 April to discuss the establishment of a Foundation for Sport and the Arts. I envisage discussing the foundation with a variety of sports organisations over the coming months.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in full the organisations with which Ministers or officials in his Department have held meetings with regard to establishing the proposed Foundation for Sport and the Arts; and on what dates such meetings took place.

Mr. Fallon: Officials from the Department of Education and Science met officials from Her Majesty's Treasury on 21 March to discuss the establishment of the Foundation for Sport and the Arts. Officials have also spoken, informally, to a number of sporting organisations.

Birmingham City Action Team

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many meetings of the Birmingham city action team in 1990 and the first three months of 1991 were attended by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I attended the meetings on 12 March 1990 and 30 January 1991 to agree the annual action plan.

FE Lecturers

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will update the information provided in his answer of 18 December 1989, Official Report, columns 35-36, to the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) relating to the pay received by further education lecturers.

Mr. Eggar: I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

ENERGY

Electricity Prices

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on electricity prices.

Mr. Wakeham: Electricity prices are a matter for the regional electricity companies subject to their statutory and licence requirements.

Onshore Petroleum Licensing

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his future plans for onshore petroleum licensing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: The Petroleum (Production) (Landward Areas) Regulations 1991 (SI 1991 No. 981) were laid before the House today. These regulations are in substantially the same form as the previous regulations which provide for separate licences to cover the conduct of each of the exploration, appraisal and development stages. Operations under the licences are subject to the normal planning process. The new regulations, which follow discussions with the industry, incorporate a number of small changes and are designed to facilitate the conduct of operations. They will come into force on 9 May and will govern the arrangements for the next onshore licensing round.

As soon as possible, I will publish in the London and Edinburgh Gazettes a formal announcement giving the detailed financial terms for new landward licences and the basis on which awards will be made. The notice will invite applications for a new round of landward exploration licensing.

In parallel with the new regulations, I will be making arrangements allowing holders of old-style production licences, which covered exploration, appraisal and development activities, to transfer the exploration acreage in these licences to the new style of exploration licences.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the Government buildings currently using combined heat and power technology.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Office of Electricity Regulation—OFFER—is in the process of compiling a database of CHP projects operating in Great Britain which will include the Government estate. The information requested by the hon. Member will start to become available when the OFFER database becomes operational this autumn.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Union Flag

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has supplied a union flag to the vehicle inspection and driving test centre, Hamiltonsbawn road, Armagh; if the centre has been advised of the dates on which the union flag is to be flown; why no union flag was flown at these premises on St. Patrick's day and on Easter day; what steps are being taken to arrange for the union flag to be flown on 12 July; and if he will make a statement about future arrangements to fly the union flag at these premises.

Dr. Mawhinney: A union flag has been supplied to the vehicle inspection and driving test centre, Hamiltonsbawn road, Armagh and the centre has been advised of the prescribed days on which the union flag is to be flown. The union flag was not flown on St. Patrick's day and Easter Sunday due to an oversight by the staff at the centre. This oversight has been drawn to the attention of the staff and they have been instructed to ensure that the union flag is flown on all appropriate dates.

Firefighters

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many operational (a) men and (b) women firefighters are employed in each fire authority/FCDA in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: The Fire Authority for Northern Ireland which serves the whole of the province employs 1,792 male and one female firefighters.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mr. Colin Wallace

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General what representations he has received from Mr. James Nichol, lawyer for Mr. Colin Wallace.

The Attorney-General: I have received no representations from Mr. Nichol, and have no reason to anticipate any.

Bowbelle

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Attorney-General if he will take steps to ensure that a decision is taken this week as to whether to proceed with the prosecution of the skipper of the dredger the Bowbelle.

The Attorney-General: The decision whether to seek a re-trial rests with the Director of Public Prosecutions; he is reviewing the case. His decision will be taken with the maximum expedition consistent with thorough consideration. I have drawn the hon. Member's concern to his attention.

Rape

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the training provided to judges to enable them to deal adequately with rape cases.

The Attorney-General: The Judicial Studies Board is responsible for the provision of training and information for judges. The policy with regard to the proper conduct of trials and appropriate levels of sentence in the Crown Court are laid down in decisions of the Court of Appeal criminal division.

The board has produced guidance for trial judges in summing up to juries and a volume of sentencing guidelines, which includes sentences for rape. Copies have been distributed to each judge.

At seminars run by the board judges are reminded that it is their duty to be sensitive to the difficulties of all those who come to court, including complainants in cases of alleged rape or other sexual assaults, who are often under considerable strain and may suffer distress whilst giving evidence.

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Attorney-General whether he contemplates any action against British companies named by the US Government who have allegedly been trading in weapons with the Iraqi Government.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 15 April by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Field), Official Report, columns 30-31. The list published by the United States Department of the Treasury concerned a number of companies and individuals whom the director of the Office of Foreign Assets Control had determined to be owned or controlled by or to be acting or purporting to act directly or indirectly on behalf of the Government of Iraq. I am informed that the US authorities have not alleged that those on the list have broken sanctions or controls on the export of arms. A very few cases concerning persons or companies in the United Kingdom where possible breaches of restrictions on exports to Iraq have come to light are being investigated by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

Women Judges

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Attorney-General how many women judges are currently appointed; and what was the percentage of women judges for each of the last 10 years appointed to the High Court and equivalent in criminal cases.

The Attorney-General: There are currently 22 women judges—4·3 per cent.—out of a total of 517 High Court and circuit judges. High Court and circuit judges are not generally assigned exclusively to criminal or civil work and most sit in the Crown Court at some time. Figures for appointments to the High Court and circuit bench over the last 10 years are as follows:

	Numbers appointed	Women appointed	Percentage
1981	23	1	4·3
1982	28	—	—
1983	31	2	6·5
1984	35	—	—
1985	35	2	5·7
1986	59	3	5·1
1987	29	—	—
1988	44	1	2·3
1989	39	1	2·6
1990	41	4	9·8
[1]1991	15	2	13·3

[1] To 17 April.

Judiciary

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Attorney-General what proposals the Lord Chancellor has to improve the qualifications and training of the judiciary.

The Attorney-General: The Courts and Legal Services Act was considered and approved by both Houses prior to receiving Royal Assent on 1 November 1990. Section 71 and schedule 10 of that Act revised the qualifications for appointment to all levels of the judiciary. The new arrangements, which have effect from 1 January 1991, mean that higher judicial appointments are now open to solicitors as well as barristers who obtain the required qualifications, and posts are open generally to those who obtain the required rights of audience before the courts whether they are solicitors, barristers or otherwise qualified. My noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has no plans to change the qualifications for judicial appointment again in the near future. In addition, to ensure a well-qualified judiciary, appointments to part-time posts are normally made from candidates with standing and experience in the relevant field of law. In making or recommending appointments to a full-time judicial post the Lord Chancellor normally requires the candidate to have served in a similar post in a part-time capacity. Both before and during this part-time service the Lord Chancellor assesses the candidate's work and abilities to establish his or her competence and suitability for judicial posts.

The training of newly appointed judicial officers and the provisions of continued judicial studies for the experienced judiciary is the responsibility of the Judicial Studies Board. Originally the training provided by the board was confined to the criminal field but in recent years its role has been extended to cover judicial studies in the civil and family jurisdictions and also the stipendiary magistrates and certain legal chairmen and members of tribunals.

In addition to its regular programme of induction courses and refresher seminars the board organises training in respect of new legislation, such as the Children Act and on specialist subjects such as fraud.

Despite the fact that the volume and range of training provided by the board has already increased significantly improvements will continue to be made. The content and format of seminars will be reviewed regularly as will the range of topics covered. The publications produced by the board are also being revised and consideration is being given to issuing further volumes and other material such as video or audio tapes.

The board and the four committees have produced a strategy document to cover the next five years. It will be included in the Judicial Studies Board report which will be published during autumn 1991.

Conciliation Services

Mr. Sims: To ask the Attorney-General what financial support the Lord Chancellor's Department plans to give for the provision of conciliation services.

The Attorney-General: The Government have no immediate plans to provide financial support for conciliation services. The Government are presently reviewing all aspects of divorce reform and conciliation is under consideration as part of that review.

EMPLOYMENT

Gas Surge (Royston)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will set up a public inquiry into the gas surge in Royston on 8 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive are currently investigating the gas incident on 8 March in Royston. I do not propose to set up a public inquiry since this would be unlikely to identify any causes or contributory factors which will not be identified by the HSE investigation. The results of HSE's investigation will be published.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the actions he has taken since the gas surge in Royston on 8 March in order to prevent a recurrence of this event.

Mr. Jackson: Inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive are carrying out a full investigation into the gas incident at Royston on 8 March. The HSE will decide what action, if any, is appropriate when the investigation is completed.

I understand that British Gas has replaced approximately 4,000 m of pipeline as a result of the incident.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the dates of the contacts he has had, whether by telephone, letter or meetings, on the lessons of the gas surge in Royston on 8 March with (a) Royston town council and (b) British Gas.

Mr. Jackson: The Health and Safety Executive has had contact on the following dates with Royston town council and British Gas about the gas incident in Royston on 8 March:

(a) Contact with Royston Town Council	(b) Contact with British Gas
15 March	11 March
21 March	12 March
25 March	27 March
28 March	11 April
10 April 1991	12 April
	16 April 1991

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will visit Royston as part of his assessment of the implications of the gas surge on 8 March.

Mr. Jackson: The Health and Safety Executive is keeping me informed of progress with its investigation into the gas incident in Royston on 8 March. I have no plans to visit Royston.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Auditors

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received reports from the Director General of Fair Trading under part II of the Companies Act 1989 on the effect on competition of the rules and guidance of qualifying and supervisory bodies for auditors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Yes. The director general has submitted reports on the rules and guidance of all the applicants for recognition under part II of the Companies Act 1989, and I have placed copies of his reports in the Library. Further copies can be obtained from his office. Copies of the applications can be obtained from the applicants on request.

The director general discerns no significant anti-competitive effects in the rules and guidance of the qualifying bodies which have applied for recognition. He finds that a number of rules of some of the supervisory body applicants relating to the ownership and control of audit firms are likely to restrict or distort competition to a significant extent.

I would welcome comments on the director general's findings, and in particular on whether the rules he finds anticompetitive are nevertheless reasonably justifiable having regard to the purpose of part II of the 1989 Act. I should be grateful if any comments reached me by 15 May. Comments on any other aspects of the applications made under part II should also reach the Department by that date.

Liverpool Polytechnic

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from Liverpool polytechnic about it wrongly being on the United States Treasury list of blacklisted organisations; what action his Department has taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Salisbury [holding answer 17 April 1991]: Liverpool polytechnic has made a number of approaches to my Department. As a result, the British embassy in Washington has raised the matter of the inclusion of the polytechnic's name in the United States Department of Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control list of "specially designated nationals".

WALES

Education (Laboratory Technicians)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many laboratory technicians are employed in each local education authority in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: In September 1990 the number of laboratory technicians employed in secondary schools was as follows:

	Full-time	Part-time	Total
Clwyd	61	42	103
Dyfed	61	28	89
Gwent	81	22	103
Gwynedd	30	12	42
Mid Glamorgan	116	19	135
Powys	25	10	35
South Glamorgan	69	25	94
West Glamorgan	93	13	106

Schools (Absenteeism)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on absenteeism in (a) primary schools and (b) high schools in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: It is important to tackle truancy more vigorously to ensure that the national curriculum and other education reforms benefit all pupils. My right hon. Friends, the Secretary of State for Education and Science and the Secretary of State of Wales have this week issued for consultation a draft circular on school attendance, together with draft regulations about pupil registration and the publication of information about rates of attendance. We expect schools to give the highest priority to maximising rates of attendance, and to work with parents, local education authorities and others to achieve that objective.

Rent Officers

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average cost of processing applications under section 121 of the Housing Act 1988 by the rent officer service.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I estimate that the average cost of each application is about £25.

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications the rent officer service in Wales is handling under section 121 of the Housing Act 1988.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: During the year ended February 1991 the rent officer service received an average of 2,670 cases per month under section 121 of the Housing Act 1988.

Single European Market

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiative he has taken, for each local education authority in Wales, individually, to enable them to prepare their educational systems for the single European market in 1992.

Sir Wyn Roberts: It is for local education authorities to prepare programmes to meet changing needs and policies. I understand that the Welsh Joint Education Committee is offering active and specific assistance to LEAs in Wales and through them to all their education institutions to help them develop their responses to European Community initiatives. In addition, the Department is investigating the need for a unit to provide advice and guidance about European Community education programmes for further and higher education institutions in the Principality.

Teacher Recruitment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he plans for each of the local education authorities in Wales individually, to enable them to obtain more (i) foreign language teachers and (ii) Welsh teachers.

Sir Wyn Roberts: We have introduced a series of measures designed to improve the supply of modern foreign language teachers and teachers of Welsh. These include:

i. adding modern foreign languages and Welsh to the shortage subject Trainee Teacher Bursary Scheme for students entering eligible courses in the autumn of 1990. At the same time the value of the bursary was increased to £1,500;

ii. making £134,000 available under the Grants for Education Support and Training programme (GEST) to support Articled Teacher schemes. Clwyd is the one Local Education Authority in Wales to apply for support and the school-based training scheme will aim to attract graduates in shortage areas identified by the authority which include modern foreign languages and Welsh;

iii. approving, also under the GEST programme, local authority expenditure of some £228,000 in 1991-92 on recruitment measures which will seek to attract former teachers and mature entrants to teaching. Each scheme will seek to address local recruitment need including teachers of modern languages and Welsh where these are identified as shortage areas;

iv. investing heavily in in-service training to increase the supply of Welsh language teachers. In 1990-91 we made available £1 million to help existing teachers of other subjects to gain the necessary expertise to teach Welsh as well. For 1991-92, £1·8 million is to be spent on such training. In addition students at initial teacher training institutions in Wales will have the opportunity to learn the language while they are training to become primary school teachers.

Queensferry Bypass (Fencing)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the safety of the boundary fencing adjacent to the Brossley housing estate, Garden City and the A494 Queensferry bypass; and if he will inspect the fencing.

Sir Wyn Roberts: There is no trunk road boundary fencing adjacent to the Brossley housing estate. It was a condition of the planning consent imposed on the developer of the Brossley housing estate that a solid barrier not less than 4ft 6in. high must be erected along the existing trunk road frontage of the site. This fence has nver been erected. Fences exist at the top of the embankments on each side of the A494 trunk road. These have been inspected and temporary repairs effected.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will repair deficient fencing on the A494 Queensferry bypass where it borders the Garden City Brossley estate.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The agent authority, Clwyd county council, has effected temporary repairs to the fencing which lies within the highway at this location.

Fell Running

Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he plans to take to ensure that safety is a first priority in all future organised fell-running events in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This is a matter for the organisers of future fell-running events.

ENVIRONMENT

Renewable Energy

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he hopes to issue his draft guidance to local authorities on renewable energy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) on 28 March, Official Report, columns 543-44.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to avoid smoke hampering aerial surveys in Kuwait.

Mr. Baldry: I am not aware of any action that would be open to my right hon. Friend.

Oil Well Fires

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment has been made of the extent to which sulphur dioxide from oil wells after they are lit is less toxic than the hydrogen sulphide produced from the same wells before ignition.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 15 April 1991 at columns 65-66 and to the related documents which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Zoological Society of London

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has launched an internal investigation into the leaking of correspondence between his Department and the Zoological Society of London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The correspondence was not leaked from my Department. We had never seen the zoo's internal memorandum quoted in the press.

Zoos

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what latest information he holds regarding figures for annual public subsidies to zoos by EC nations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Such information is not collected by the Department.

Work on Government Offices

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has yet received the advice commissioned from Arup Associates on possible remedial work on Government offices at 2 Marsham street; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Arup Associates has now provided its advice on possible remedial work on Government offices at 2 Marsham street. The report now needs to be studied in relation to the accommodation requirements of the two Departments which currently occupy the building and in the context of overall future demand for Government offices in central London. Until this further work has been carried out, it would not be sensible to attempt to take investment decisions in respect of the building at 2 Marsham street alone.

Ancient Monuments

Mr. Cormack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will issue the consultation paper, announced in the Environment White Paper "This Common Inheritance", Cm. 1200, on amendments to the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979.

Sir George Young: A consultation paper has been issued today, for circulation in England, Scotland and Wales. The document puts forward a number of suggested improvements, including clarifying the definition of damage to an ancient monument and making it an offence to remove objects from scheduled sites. Copies of the document have been deposited in the Libraries of both Houses—consultees have two months within which to respond. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales will be consulting similarly.

Right to Buy

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many dwellings each local authority has sold under the right-to-buy legislation or voluntarily since April 1979; and what percentage of the total local authority stock they represent.

Mr. Yeo: I have placed in the Library a table giving available information on local authority sales up to December 1990. It shows year by year information for each authority since 1985-86 together with cumulative figures since April 1979 and the proportion of their stock sold since April 1979.

Drought Orders

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to modify his direction to water companies specifying the uses of water which may be restricted by means of drought orders made under section 131 of the Water Act 1989.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, have today given a fresh direction, the Drought Direction 1991, to water companies under section 131(4)(b) of the 1989 Act. The direction prescribes the uses of water which a company may be authorised to prohibit or limit under Drought Orders made by the Secretary of State.

The 1991 direction replaces the Drought Direction 1989, with the following modifications:

(a) the watering of all gardens (other than market gardens), together with landscaped areas such as road verges, may now be restricted (previously, only the watering of ornamental gardens or lawns was specified);

(b) the watering of all surfaces used for sport or recreation, including artificial surfaces, may now be restricted;

(c) the filling of privately owned pools designed for use in a medical treatment programme, or requiring to be filled during construction as a necessary part of the construction process, is now exempt from restrictions;

(d) the manual cleaning of windows is now exempt from restrictions.

Once a Drought Order has been made, its implementation and enforcement are the responsibility of the relevant water company. I am placing a copy of the Drought Direction 1991 in the Library.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a table showing, for each financial year from 1978-79 to 1990-91 inclusive, in constant price terms (a) total grants from central Government to local government, (b) total housing benefit, or its predecessors, rent and rate rebates, (c) other social security benefits paid in respect of rates or the community charge and (d) the total of the above support.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Food Production

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all the third world countries receiving funding and technical co-operation from the United Kingdom in order to improve technologies in the production of safe and good quality food.

Mrs. Chalker: Third world countries currently receiving United Kingdom funding and technical co-operation for improving the safety and quality of the food they produce are listed below. The Natural Resources Institute at Chatham, through its ODA-funded food sciences and crop utilisation programmes, plays a leading role in this field of assistance. Many of the other research and development programmes on renewable natural resources funded by ODA, including its suppport for the international agricultural research centres of the Consultative Group on International Agricultural Research, also contribute to the quality of food products.

UN Conference on Environment and Development

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution his Department is making to the preparations to the United Nations conference on the environment and development which is due to be held in Brazil in 1992.

Mrs. Chalker: We continue to work to make the conference a success. ODA and diplomatic wing officials played a full part in the second meeting of the preparatory committee for the conference in Geneva in March and will continue to do so at future meetings. We have offered £32,000 to the voluntary fund established to finance participation by developing countries in the preparations for the conference. We are helping finance the preparation of national reports from Indonesia, Pakistan and Zimbabwe for the conference. Together with the Department of Trade and Industry we have financed a study on technology transfer to help developing countries address environmental problems, with a focus on global warming.

Development Aid

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much United Kingdom development aid was distributed to (a) the Ethiopian Relief and Rehabilitation Commission, (b) Ethiopian church organisations and (c) the Ethiopian Red Cross (i) last year and (ii) in the current year; what proportion of total aid that represents for each; amd what are the reasons for the extent of the distribution to each.

Mrs. Chalker: Since the beginning of 1990 we have committed more than £30 million in humanitarian assistance to Ethiopia. Our assistance is channelled through international and British relief agencies, who work closely with Ethiopian non-governmental organisations, including churches and other bodies. Our bilateral Government-to-Government technical co-operation programme is worth about £3 million a year and is concentrated on education and training, agriculture, and disaster prevention and preparedness.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cyprus

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has had any communication with the Turkish Cypriots about the Cypriot Government's application for Cyprus to join the European Community; if he supports the application; and what progress has been made by this application.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Cyprus applied to join the EC in July 1990. The Commission is producing an opinion on the application, which will be submitted to the member states for their consideration.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Cypriot Government have accepted United Nations resolution 649 calling for a bizonal federal Cyprus; when the United Nations approved resolution 649; and if he will make a statement on political progress within the island of Cyprus.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The UN Secretary-General's efforts to promote a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement of the intercommunal dispute in Cyprus continue with our full support. The way forward is mapped out in UN Security Council resolution 649 of 12 March 1990, which both communities have accepted.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the United Kingdom Government have received as a guarantor power concerning the purchase of arms by the Government of Cyprus.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are aware of Turkish and Turkish Cypriot concern at the purchase of arms by the Government of Cyprus. It is our long-standing policy to sell weapons neither to the Greek Cypriot National Guard nor to the Turkish Cypriot armed forces.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Saudi Government about the volume of paperwork involved before equipment can be sent to fight fires in Kuwait.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have had no discussions with the Saudi Government on this subject.

Antarctica

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had with the Government of Argentina on the recent review of Her Majesty's Government's policy towards Antarctica.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have put proposals arising from our review of United Kingdom policy to all Antarctic treaty consultative parties, including Argentina, for their consideration in advance of the special consultative meeting in Madrid, starting on 22 April.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had with Norway on the recent review of Government policy towards Antarctica.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have put proposals arising from our review of policy to all Antarctic treaty consultative parties, including Norway, for their consideration in advance of the special consultative meeting in Madrid starting on 22 April.

United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what resources will be required to finance the measures necessary to enable Britain to conform to the UN convention on the rights of the child.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We do not anticipate that any extra resources will be required to meet the United Kingdom obligations under the convention.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes in legislation he proposes to enable Britain to conform to the UN convention on the rights of the child.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None. With the reservations envisaged in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on 21 March at column 192-3 we are satisfied that the United Kingdom mainland will be able to meet its obligations under the convention.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether his Department has yet held consultations on the manner in which it will monitor the requirements of the UN convention on the rights of the child.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No. After ratification the Department of Health will co-ordinate the United Kingdom's initial report with other home Departments.

European Political Union

Sir Peter Blaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement on the outcome of the ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference on political union on 15 April.

Mr. Hurd: The ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference on political union on 15 April, attended by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, discussed Presidency proposals on a common foreign and security policy and the powers of the European Parliament.

In discussion of a common foreign and security policy my hon. Friend the Minister of State re-stated our arguments, as set out in my answer to the House on 6 March 1991 at column 203, for strengthening co-operation among the Twelve on foreign and security policy issues and for strengthening the Western European Union (WEU) as a bridge between NATO and the Twelve. There continues to be a range of views among other member states on this and related issues.

A range of views was expressed too on the Presidency proposals for strengthening the European Parliament's role in the legislative procedure through the introduction of "co-decision" procedures. Several members states, like the United Kingdom, were unable to accept the proposals.

Ministers will continue discussion of both these subjects at future meetings of special representatives and of Ministers. These meetings will also consider the composite text of all proposed Treaty amendments now circulated by the Presidency.

Foreign Affairs Council

Sir Peter Blaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council on 15 April.

Mr. Hurd: A meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council took place in Luxembourg on 15 April. My hon. Friend, the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs represented the United Kingdom.

The Council reviewed the progress of the EC/EFTA negotiations on a European economic area, which will extend the internal market to the EFTA countries. The Council instructed the Committee of Permanent Representatives to continue work on the detailed issues and agreed to propose to EFTA a joint EC/EFTA ministerial meeting on 13 May.

The Commission briefed the Council about the negotiations for association agreements between the European Community and Hungary, Poland and Czechoslovakia. The Council declared its readiness to adopt a flexible approach in the negotiations, particularly on trade access, with a view to concluding them as soon as possible.

The Council discussed a draft EC/Japan declaration and agreed that further work was necessary before the draft could be passed to the Japanese. It also considered which countries should participate in the European energy charter and agreed to re-examine the issue on 15 May.

At the request of the United Kingdom, Ministers discussed a package of aid from the Community and member states to help those suffering famine in Africa. They agreed on the need for emergency aid and asked the Commission to make proposals urgently.

Ministers also discussed disbursement of the 150 mecu humanitarian assistance for Iraqi refugees agreed at the Special European Council of 8 April. They invited the President of the Council to discuss with the United Nations Secretary-General how Saddam Hussein could be held to account for his actions.

Hong Kong

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of all exports of ivory from Hong Kong to Argentina in the last two years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 25 March 1991]: According to the Hong Kong authorities export licensing records, no commercial exports of ivory to Argentina have been authorised in the last two years.

THE ARTS

Library Books

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Minister for the Arts what average amount per head of population has been spent on library books in the county of Durham each year since 1987.

Mr. Renton: Expenditure in the county of Durham per head of population has risen over the past four years as follows:

1986-87	0·69
1987-88	0·85
1988-89	0·90
1989-90	1·04

Foundation for Sport and the Arts

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Minister for the Arts (1) if he will list in full the organisations with which Ministers or officials in his Department have held meetings with regard to establishing the proposed Foundation for Sport and the Arts and the dates on which such meetings took place;

(2) if he will list in full the organisations with which Ministers or officials in his Department plan to hold meetings with regard to establishing the proposed Foundation for Sport and the Arts and the dates on which such meetings will take place.

Mr. Renton: I have been in touch with ministerial colleagues and others with an interest in the proposed foundation. My Department will continue to be closely involved in taking this forward.

HEALTH

Adoption

Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his officials' recent visit to Romania concerning inter-country adoption.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) on 26 March at columns 763-64. A team of Home Office and Department of Health officials visited Bucharest in November 1990 to discuss further how to co-ordinate help and facilitate procedures for British couples who wish to adopt Romanian children. We continue to be in regular contact with the Romanian authorities.

Sickle Cell Disorders

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to introduce universal screening of new-born babies for sickle cell disorders and to develop national policies on pain control hospital care and the prevention of crises in people having sickle cell disorders.

Mr. Dorrell: It is important that infants affected by sickle cell disease are identified at an early stage so that they can receive appropriate treatment. Screening services are generally offered to those members of the population most likely to be affected—those orginating from Africa, the Mediterranean or middle east. This disease is rare in the indigenous population. It would therefore be unreasonable to screen all new-born babies for the disorder.

In 1988 the Department introduced haemoglobinopathy cards which are given to patients with sickle cell disease or thalassaemia with the aim of ensuring that, in an emergency, their condition is identified and that they receive appropriate treatment. The decision on what measures are necessary to control pain and prevent crises is for the individual doctor to make, taking into account his knowledge of the patient and the particular circumstances of the episode. This is a matter of clinical judgment.

Prestwich Hospital, Salford

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the patients of Pinfold, Troy and Tottington wards at Prestwich hospital, Salford, will be evacuated, as advised by the health advisory service/social services inspectorate in its report dated October 1990, No. (90) MI/E.12.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor) on 15 April at column 80.

Pharmacists (Advice)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish in the Official Report the written advice of his Department to retail pharmacists regarding the methods of disposal for unwanted medicines and poisons returned to them by their customers.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Advice is given by the Royal Pharmaceutical Society to community pharmacists on the disposal of returned medicines. The Department has not issued any written advice.

Medical Students

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any plans to change the arrangements under which medical students have access to national health service patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Medical students have always undertaken clinical work in hospitals, and this forms an essential part of their training. There are also long-standing arrangements under which final year students may assist in hospitals when a house officer is on leave. Following consultation with health authorities, the General Medical Council, the medical profession and the universities, revised guidance has been issued clarifying the circumstances in which students may have access, under close supervision, to hospital patients. A copy of the guidance has been placed in the Library.

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the progress of his Department's negotiations to date with the tobacco industry on the control of tobacco advertising.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to the reply 11 March 1991]: I am pleased to announce that the Health Departments and the industry have reached agreement in principle on a revised voluntary agreement for the next three years on the advertising and promotion of tobacco products. The new agreement will be published and come into force in the next few weeks when final drafting has been completed and the agreement has been approved under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976.

In a major addition to the voluntary agreement, the industry has agreed to remove 50 per cent. of shopfront advertising over five years. The change will start once the agreement has been concluded and will apply to all external permanent advertising material on shops. In making this reduction, the industry will act in consultation with the retail trade; it will seek to apply the reduction evenly over time by type of sign and by geographic location; priority will be given to reducing the number of those permanent advertising signs on shops clearly visible from schools; the reductions will be validated annually by independent audit; the results of the audit will be submitted to the monitoring committee and will appear in the committee's annual report.

A major change in the agreement is that from 1 July all external signs on shops will carry a health warning; under the existing agreement signs erected before 1983 have not been required to carry a health warning and this has caused confusion to the public and has been commented on in reports of the monitoring committee.

The new agreement will also extend the present ban on poster advertising which is visible from schools to children's playgrounds.

Other parts of the existing voluntary agreement will also be updated and anomalies, which have come to notice through the reports of the monitoring committee, will be removed.

I am also pleased to announce that, following the resignation of Sir Peter Lazarus as chairman of the monitoring committee, the Government with the agreement of the industry, have appointed Sir John Blelloch, formerly permanent secretary at the Northern Ireland Office, to be the new chairman of the committee.

The Government welcome these steps to maintain and develop the system of voluntary agreements, to which they remain committed.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Security Benefits

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give details of the social security benefits available to carers, and what steps his Department is taking to publicise these benefits.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) on 27 March 1991 at column 448.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number and proportion of people claiming unemployment benefit who were disqualified or disallowed for availability or voluntary unemployment reaons and, because they were not eligible for income support, received no benefit, for May 1989 and the latest available date.

Mr. Jack: Information on the numbers of unemployed claimants and the decisions of adjudication officers where the question of availability or voluntary unemployment arises, is in "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Quarterly Analysis of Unemployed Claimants" and "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Quarterly Analysis of Decisions of Adjudication Officers", copies of which are in the Library. Figures as to the number and proportion of people disqualified or disallowed for receiving unemployment benefit who were not entitled to income support are not available.

Claimants

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people made claims for (a) income support only, (b) unemployment benefit only and (c) income support and unemployment benefit for each quarter since the beginning of 1987; and what were the proportions and numbers in each quarter whose claims were disallowed, disqualified or suspended for (i) non-availability, (ii) refusal of employment and neglect to avail, (iii) restricted availability, (iv) not actively seeking work and (v) other reasons.

Mr. Jack: Information on the numbers of unemployed people claiming benefit and the decisions of adjudication officers where those claims were disallowed, is in "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Quarterly Analysis of Unemployed Claimants" and "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Quarterly Analysis of Decisions of Adjudication Officers", copies of which are in the Library. No information is available on the total number of claims suspended or the proportion of income support claims which resulted in a disallowance.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims for (a) unemployment benefit only; ((b) income support only and (c) both income support and unemployment benefit were made by unemployed people for each quarter from the beginning of 1987 to date.

Mr. Jack: The information is in "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Quarterly Analysis of Unemployed Claimants", copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion and what number of claimants on the unemployment register are claiming income support as (a) incapable of work, (b) lone parents, (c) retired, (d) aged 60 years and over and (e) studying.

Mr. Jack: Claimants who are incapable of work or retired are not on the unemployed register. Information on those aged 60 and over who choose to register is in "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Half-yearly Analysis of Unemployed Claimants", a copy of which is in the Library. Information is not available as to the number of lone parents or those who are studying.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the incorporation of attendance allowance into disability living allowance will result in any reduction of the number of people currently qualifying for attendance allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: There will be no reduction in the number of people receiving the existing rates of benefit. Recipients of attendance allowance who are over the age of 65 will continue to receive that benefit after April 1992, and those who are under 65 will be transferred automatically to the corresponding rate of the care component of the new disability living allowance.

Income Support

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether loans can be paid from the discretionary social fund to applicants claiming income support while they are waiting for seven days to receive payment of income support paid in arrears; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Yes. Crisis loans may be paid from the social fund to people who are awaiting their first payment of income support, and who are facing a serious risk to their health or safety. In 1989-90, a total of 191,000 such awards were made, at a total cost of £6·2 million. Over 90 per cent. of crisis loan applications are successful.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

River Severn

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he proposes to take following the representations he has received on the problems of pollution and flooding along the River Severn.

Mr. Curry: Flood and tidal defences along the River Severn are kept under constant review by the National Rivers Authority and the Department. As a result of flooding from the River Severn, the Severn Trent region of the NRA which is responsible for the promotion of flood defence work along the river, has instigated investigations in the form of mathematical and physical modelling, and have included defence works in their forward programme of work to be submitted to the Department for grant aid.

The Ministry is grant-aiding a comprehensive scheme to raise flood walls and embankments on the River Severn, below Gloucester. Following the tidal flooding in February 1990, and additional section of works is being added.

Matters relating to the problems of pollution along the River Severn are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the number of fishing vessels held in port by the eight consecutive day rule in February and March in South Shields, Seahouses, Bridlington, Scarborough, Grimsby and Fleetwood.

Mr. Curry: The information requested by the hon. Member is as follows:

	February 1991	March 1991
Bridlington	9	5
Scarborough	5	1
Grimsby	24	4
Fleetwood	1	1

The reduction in March reflects the Government's success in securing a gear option for restricted vessels.

Whale Conservation

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps the Government are taking to ensure that a policy of whale conservation is retained for the United Kingdom, other EC countries and other international bodies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The Government have long been in the lead in pressing for the conservation of whales. The moratorium achieved under the International Whaling Commission is still in place after its review last year and the number of whales taken for scientific whaling purposes during the moratorium has been greatly reduced by the pressures of the IWC. Further, the European Community has prohibited trade in whale products. The Government will continue to work for the conservation of whales through all possible means.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Taxation

12. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of gross earnings a married couple with one earner on average earnings, with two children, paid in all taxes and national insurance, including local taxes and treating child benefit as a negative income tax, in 1978-79, 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Maples: About 35 per cent. in 1978-79 and about 36 per cent. in 1989-90. Estimates including local taxes are not yet available for 1990-91.

Corporation Tax

13. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from small businesses concerning reductions in corporation tax.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations from small businesses and representative bodies. The overwhelming majority support the Budget measures.

21. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the level of corporation tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We have received a number of representations.

23. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the rate of corporation tax in the United Kingdom; and what is the average rate in other European Community countries.

Mr. Maude: The main rate of corporation tax will be 34 per cent. for 1990 and 33 per cent. for 1991, down from 52 per cent. in 1979. The EC average, excluding the United Kingdom, for 1990 is 40·2 per cent. Germany's rate is 50 per cent.; Belgium's is 43 per cent. and France's is 34 per cent. Britain and Luxembourg now have the lowest main rate of corporation tax in the Community.

Inflation

15. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the inflation rate for the second, third and fourth quarters of 1991.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Retail price inflation is expected to fall sharply in April, and to decline further thereafter to 4 per cent. by the fourth quarter of 1991.

Child Benefit

16. Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the current rate of child benefit if uprated in line with inflation since 1987.

Mr. Mellor: It would be £9·55. The increases this year in child benefit will raise the rate of the eldest eligible child by over 25 per cent.

Value Added Tax

17. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received over the increase in value added tax.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend has received many representations over the increase in the rate of VAT.

Mr. Hill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy on companies charging value added tax at 17·5 per cent. on goods and services supplied between 1 January 1991 and the date of his Budget statement; and if he will bring forward proposals to prevent companies from back-dating the increase in value added tax.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The normal rules for working out the date for VAT purposes—the tax point—apply when there is a change of rate. This entitles traders to apply the old rate—15 per cent.—to goods or services supplied before 1 April—the date from which the rate was increased to 17·5 per cent. Moreover, even where the issue of a tax invoice after 1 April would have created a tax point at the new rate, there is in existence a concession to the normal rules which allows traders to apply the old rate, as long as the goods or services were supplied prior to 1 April. There is therefore no question of the Government forcing companies to backdate the increase in VAT.

Where companies do not take advantage of the concession available, perhaps because of administrative difficulties, this is a matter for their own commercial judgment, of course, taking account of relations with their customers.

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue would be raised by charging value added tax at 17·5 per cent. on those goods and services which are at present exempt from value added tax.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The effect of applying VAT to the exempt sector cannot readily be determined, because some of the outputs such as financial services are difficult to value or tax. An estimate could be prepared only at disproportionate cost. Estimates of the cost of zero-rating are in table 4B.1 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of gross earnings value added tax took up for a family on average male earnings with two children in (a) 1978-79 and (b) 1989-90.

Mr. Maude: Approximately 2·7 per cent. of gross earnings and 5·0 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had about value added tax misdeclaration penalties from the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am aware that my hon. Friend has made representations to Treasury Ministers expressing concern about the operation of the penalty regime.

In my Budget statement I acknowledged these concerns and announced the setting-up of a thorough review of the penalty regime with a view to legislation for changes in the 1992 Budget. The review will include full consultation with the accountancy profession and business interests and all constructive proposals will be carefully considered. Pending the outcome of the review the rate of penalty was reduced from 30 to 20 per cent. from 20 March 1991 and relaxations were introducted by Customs.

Local Government Finance

18. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of local government expenditure in England he anticipates will be met from central Government in (a) 1991-92, (b) 1992-93, (c) 1993-94, (d) 1994-95 and (e) 1995-96.

Mr. Mellor: For 1991-92, around 83 per cent. of budgeted current expenditure. As my right hon. Friend said in his Budget statement, local taxation is now at a level that the Government believe should be sustainable in the longer term. Much depends however on the level of local authority expenditure in future years.

27. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the percentage of local government expenditure paid for by central Government in 1991-92; what it was in 1986-87 and 1981-82; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Central Government support for local authorities in 1991-92 will account for around 83 per cent. of current expenditure in England, compared with 78 per cent. in 1986-87 and 81 per cent. in 1981-82. For consistency, the figures for past years include income from non-domestic rates.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis for the years 1984-85 to 1993-94, using the territories and economic categories of table 5.7 of Cm. 1520, of changes between total local authority expenditure (a) between table 21.4.11. of Cm. 1021 and table 5.11 of Cm. 1520 and (b) between table 5.11 of Cm. 1021 and the "Financial Report and Budget Statement" 1991-92.

Mr. Mellor: Information on differences between the figures for local authority expenditure given in the 1990 public expenditure White Paper—Cm. 1021—and the "Statistical Supplement to the 1990 Autumn Statement"—Cm. 1520—for the years up to 1989-90 are given in the table. They are on the same basis as the information on differences from Cm. 1021 presented in the supplement, that is, they exclude differences arising from changes in the way expenditure is recorded—classification changes—or from transfers between Departments or sectors, for example, switching responsibility for expenditure from central Government to local authorities. Corresponding analyses for 1990-91 and future years and on differences between the supplement and the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" are not available.

Charities

19. Mr. Morley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the proposals he announced in the Budget for assistance to charities in respect of value added tax.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend has received a large number of representations from charities since his Budget statement.

25. Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from charities since his Budget statement.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend has received a large number of representations from charities since his Budget statement.

Manufacturing Output

20. Ms. Quin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the change in manufacturing output has been in the last three months.

Mr. Mellor: In the three months December to February, manufacturing output was 2·1 per cent. lower than in the previous three months.

Growth

22. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for how many consecutive quarters he forecasts growth will be negative after 1990.

Mr. Mellor: Forecasts of GDP are published for half-yearly periods. The Budget forecast shows a fall in GDP of 1½ per cent. between the second half of 1990 and the first half of 1991, and growth of ¾ per cent. between the first and second halves of 1991.

Interest Rates

24. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about current interest rates.

Mr. Maples: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing).

Exchange Rate Mechanism

26. Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the position of the pound sterling within the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Maples: Sterling is currently trading a little above its central rate.

Foundation for Sport and Arts

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list in full the organisations with which Ministers or officials in his Department plan to hold meetings with regard to establishing the proposed Foundation for Sport and the Arts; and on what dates such meetings will take place;

(2) if he will list in full the organisations with which Ministers or officials in his Department have held meetings with regard to establishing the proposed Foundation for Sport and the Arts; and on what dates such meetings took place;

(3) how many meetings have taken place between Ministers and officials from his Department with representatives of the pools companies, to discuss the establishing of a new Foundation for Sport and the Arts, since 28 March; and what plans there are for further meetings;

(4) what progress has been made towards the setting up of the proposed Foundation for Sport and the Arts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Since 28 March, my officials have held one meeting—on 16 April—with representatives of Littlewoods, Vernons and Zetters, the three members of the Pools Promoters Association. Following that meeting, work is progressing towards the establishment of the Foundation for Sport and the Arts. Further meetings with the promoters will be held as necessary.

Pay Increases (Statistics)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average increase in net weekly spending power of a man with two children of seven and 11 years and a non-working wife for each extra £1 he earns if he increases his pay from (a) £100 to £110, (b) £110 to £120, (c) £120 to £130, d) £130 to £140 and (e) £140 to £150, assuming he pays average rent and community charge.

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

For the purposes of these examples it has been assumed that housing costs remain static irrespective of the level of gross earrnings. The information is set out in the tables, which show changes in net weekly spending power at the various levels of gross pay to which the hon. Member has referred. Total net income is the product of the interaction of income-related benefits and the tax system at any given level of gross earnings. All assumptions used are as those in the published tax benefit model tables. Each family is assumed to live in council property appropriate to its size and to pay estimated average rent and community charge. Average rents are provisional 1991-92 figures and community charge has been assessed at £250 per annum. Any relevant changes announced in the Budget including the October increase in child benefit, have also been incorporated. It should be noted that the results in the tables remain arbitrary. They cannot reflect, except by chance, the actual circumstances of particular people and cannot claim to be representative of the population at large. The tables use hypothetical rents so they do not reflect the full range of housing costs which people can pay.

SCOTLAND

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis for the years 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92 showing for each regional, district and island council and for Scotland as a whole (a) grant-aided expenditure, (b) grant-aided expenditure expressed as pounds per head, pounds per adult and pounds per community charge unit, (c) the community charge required to be levied to finance grant-aided expenditure, (e) the long-run community charge required to be levied to finance expenditure 1 per cent., 5 per cent. and 10 per cent. below and 1 per cent., 5 per cent. and 10 per cent. above grant-aided expenditure; (f) Government grant as a percentage of local authority expenditure at each of the spending levels specified in (e) above, (g) that level of expenditure as a percentage of grant-aided expenditure which would require a zero community charge and (h) that level of expenditure as a percentage of grant-aided expenditure which would require a zero long-run community charge.

Mr. Lang: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Vacation Hardship Allowance

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how vacation hardship allowance is calculated.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The vacation hardship allowance may be used to provide student maintenance outwith term time in certain defined circumstances. Its maximum value is broadly similar to the additional weeks allowance for students on courses with extended terms and in recent years this has been increased to reflect the movement in student maintenance rates generally. The amount actually payable in any individual case depends on the circumstances of the applicant.

On 27 March, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science announced that, subject to the approval of the necessary regulations, the equivalent discretionary allowance would be discontinued in England and Wales. Those regulations come into force on 17 April and I can confirm that it is our intention to discontinue this allowance in Scotland also.

General Practitioners

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications for budget-holding status have now been (a) received for general practitioners and (b) accepted by the boards, for each Scottish health board; and in respect of what starting date in each case.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Five applications for recognition as a GP fundholder have been received by health boards to date. The further details requested are set out in the following table.

Health board	Application received	Current status
Argyll and Clyde	1	Commenced fundholding 1 April 1991
Greater Glasgow	1	Application received March 1991: currently under consideration
Lothian	1	Commenced fundholding 1 April 1991
Tayside	2	Recognition granted; date of commencement still to be set.

Practices in Scotland may submit applications at any time during the course of a year. It is for the health board to determine and agree in consultation with the individual practices concerned the date on which recognition takes effect, and the date of commencement.

Blood Products

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those blood products produced by the Scottish blood transfusion service, with the number used in the past 10 years in (a) NHS hospitals; (b) private hospitals and (c) sold to other bodies.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not readily available in respect of the last 10 years but information relating to the four years to 31 March 1990 is set out in the following table.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give, for the past 10 years, the number of units of blood used in (a) NHS hospitals and (b) private hospitals.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not readily available in respect of each of the last 10 years but information relating to the four years ending 31 March 1990 is set out in the following table:

1989-90	11,576	128

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give, for the past 10 years, the number of units of blood used for the extraction of other blood components.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not readily available in respect of the last 10 years but information relating to the four years ending 31 March 1990 is set out in the following table:

1987-88	240,538
1988-89	243,594
1989-90	263,733

Purchaser/Provider Contracts

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps have been taken to ensure that Scottish general practitioners are aware of the terms of the purchaser/provider contracts being made on their behalf by health boards.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Circulars to health boards issued by the Scottish Office have emphasised that one of the main objectives of the new NHS contracts system is to provide health boards and GPs with the opportunity to work more closely together for the benefit of patients. Boards have therefore been instructed to set up appropriate consultative arrangements for discussion with general practitioners on their present and intended referral patterns, and to liaise on the placement of contracts and on the introduction of changes to contracts once these are in place.

Health Board Staff

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each health board the number of regraded professional and technical category B staff who have appealed against their new grade; and how many of these appeals have been heard.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information on the number of appeals by PTB staff against their new grades and on those heard is not held centrally. At Scottish appeals committee level 2 appeals have been heard and 25 are awaiting a hearing.

Designated Place Provisions

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much public money, both capital and revenue, respectively, has been invested by his Department in designated place provisions under section 5 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980 in each year since 1980.

Mr. Lang: The information is as follows:

Care for the Elderly

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of private residential or nursing homes for the elderly in each local authority which have closed in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many NHS long-stay beds for the elderly have been closed in each health board in each of the past five years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not available centrally in the form requested.

Community Care

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he proposes to take to monitor the effect on carers of the return of patients to the community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government recognise the important role played by carers and their own need for support. Funding has been provided to establish a Scottish office for the Carers National Association. In preparing community care plans local authorities will take account of the views of organisations representing carers; and in assessing the needs of individuals for community care services local authorities will take account of the support being provided by any informal carers and their ability to continue offering it. The recently introduced complaints procedure will offer improved rights for uses of services to complain if the services they receive are inadequate. All these aspects of community care will be monitored by the Scottish Office.

Funding of Health Services

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for programmes for Scotland for funds for the development of medical audit by general practitioners, money for pilot projects in areas of deprivation and local initiatives in the delivery of primary health care services to members of ethnic minority groups, along the lines of those announced for England.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Scottish arrangements for medical audit in general practice differ radically from those in England. In Scotland general practitioners and hospital doctors have equal access to a block of funds allocated to health boards for medical audit purposes, and to funding retained centrally for national projects.

By October 1990 there were 33 audit projects in hand or planned in general practice in Scotland covering 11 health boards. The project list includes four joint projects with other specialties and one national project. The total recurring resources for medical audit allocated to boards for 1991-92 amount to £2·3 million, a 50 per cent. increase over 1990-91.

Developing audit in general practice is a high priority for the Government, and from July this year an audit adviser with a national remit for facilitating the implementation process will be funded from central resources. Audit activity in general practice is expected to increase significantly as a result.

With regard to money for pilot projects in areas of deprivation and local initiatives in the delivery of primary health care to members of ethnic minorities, it is not clear to which announcement or announcements this refers. If the hon. Member cares to provide clarification of this I would be happy to provide a further response.

Health Services

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to introduce an initiative in Scotland similar to that announced for England and Wales in February for the development of services through the integration of primary and secondary health care.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The structure of the health service in Scotland already brings together all aspects of hospital, community health and family practitioner services within health board's responsibilities.

The health boards and NHS management executive in Scotland are working together to ensure that this integration works as well as possible at all levels, and thereby to improve the overall quality of service to patients.

Hospital Costs

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average annual cost of keeping an elderly person in a national health service long-stay hospital bed.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The average cost is £360 per week (£18,720 per annum) at 1989-90 prices. Details are published annually by the Common Services Agency, information and statastics division.

Education (Grants)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what current grants, within aggregate external finance, he is giving to education in 1991-92.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In 1991-92, current grants within aggregate external finance will be available to support local authority activities in extending the use of Gaelic (£1·5 million) and to assist with the cost of in-service training of teachers and lecturers (£9·0 million).

Physiological Measurement Technicians

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each health board the number, in both absolute and percentage terms, of physiological measurement technicians in each of the new pay scale categories.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: An agreement concluded by the Professional and Technical Staffs "B" Whitley Council in September 1989 introduced a new pay and grading structure for various groups of technicians in the NHS. Physiological measurement technicians were assigned to one of the eight medical technical officer (MTO) grades which are assistant, senior assistant, trainee and grades 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. Health boards have stated that on 30 September 1990 the number of staff formerly graded as physiological measurement technicians in each of the MTO grades is as set out in the following tables.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to encourage or to assist Scottish companies to contribute to the rebuilding of the infrastructure in Kuwait; and with what response.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Department of Trade and Industry has the lead role for ensuring that all United Kingdom companies are fully informed about, and assisted to participate in, the rebuilding and re-equipping of Kuwait.

Within the overall United Kingdom effort the Scottish Office Industry Department and Scottish Enterprise are working together to ensure that companies in Scotland can take full advantage of any opportunities which arise. Details of the names and capabilities of over 300 companies have been passed to DTI for inclusion in their Kuwait database and these companies will be informed about developments and opportunities as they arise. Both bodies, together with DTI, were instrumental in organising an extremely successful business briefing on rebuilding Kuwait in Edinburgh on 4 April. The Department also ensured that Scottish interests were represented in a delegation of United Kingdom businessmen, led by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, which visited Kuwait from 8 to 11 April.

Primary Testing (Leaflet)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost to his Department in respect of air freight charges to convey the leaflet, "Primary Testing: A Guide for Parents" to Shetland and subsequently distribute the leaflet to schools in Shetland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A single contract for distribution throughout Scotland was negotiated on the basis of competitive tender. The information requested is therefore not available.

Orkney Children's Panel

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to announce his decision on whether or not he consents to the removal from office of the reporter to the Orkney children's panel.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend expects to announce his decision shortly.

Fire Service

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many operational (a) men and (b) women firefighters are employed in each fire authority or fire and civil defence authority in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information, as at 31 December 1990, is as follows:

Oban Hospital

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many hospital beds were available in Oban for (a) medical, (b) surgical, (c) maternity, (d) geriatric and (e) other health care during each year since 1987; how many are currently available; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many beds will be available in the proposed new Oban hospital for (a) medical, (b) surgical, (c) maternity, (d) geriatric and (e) other health care; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest centrally available information on staffed beds in Oban hospitals for the last four years is set out in the attached table. Current available staffed beds are as at year ending 31 December 1990.

The new Oban hospital will provide 138 beds. The board's present intention is to designate 70 for acute, 62 elderly and elderly with mental disability and six for obstetrics. In addition a full range of support services will be available including out-patients, accident and emergency, operating facilities and an X-ray unit.

[1] Provisional.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made regarding the building of the new Oban hospital; what was the closing date for tenders; which bid was successful; when building will begin; when completion is expected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Tenders have been issued by Strathclyde regional council in respect of the enabling work to access the new Oban hospital site. This work will involve the realignment of the existing trunk road and creation of spur road to give site access, and is programmed to start in June this year.

Tenders for the main hospital building contract are planned for issue before the end of April. It is anticipated that the contract will be awarded in November, and on this timetable the hospital will be completed towards the end of 1994.

Community Charge

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when Scottish local authorities are to be compensated in respect of the statutory reduction of community charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: A new grant—community charge grant—is to be paid to local authorities to reimburse them for the loss of community charge income arising from the provisions of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act 1991. Payment of this grant will be made to Scottish authorities in 49 weekly instalments each totalling £8·921 million commencing later this month on the basis of an estimate of the charge income forgone by each authority. Final grant entitlement will be calculated after the end of the financial year 1991-92. Parliamentary approval of this new expenditure will be sought in a supplementary estimate for the relevant vote (class XV vote 22). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure (estimated at £26·762 million for the grant payments to be made in April and the early part of May) will be met by repayable advances from the contingencies fund.

With the consent of the Treasury, I also plan to front-load payments of revenue support grant to Scottish authorities for the current year. Through a combination of community charge grant and revenue support grant, Scottish authorities will receive grant totalling nearly £955 million by the end of June which is over £280 million more than would have been the case under the normal arrangements for the payment of revenue support grant.

It is obviously desirable that levying authorities should issue revised bills as quickly as possible, but I am satisfied that this additional grant will compensate all authorities for the loss of charge income which they are likely to face while rebilling takes place.

Educational Spending

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, at 1990-91 prices, what was the capital allocation for educational spending for each of the regional and islands councils in every year since 1978-79.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 15 April 1991]: This is a matter for the educational authorities.

DEFENCE

Hydrocarbons

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 28 March, Official Report, column 556, to the hon. Member for Newport West (Mr. Flynn), on protection against hydrocarbons, what are the interim results of the quantitative and qualitative analysis of longer-term effects of hydrocarbons released, undertaken in liaison with United States and Saudi environmental health officials.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Work is continuing on the analysis of the long-term effects of polyaromatic hydrocarbons. However, they are not expected to cause skin problems, provided exposure is intermittent and short. The current consensus also suggests that there is no risk of ill-effects to the lungs arising from short-term exposure and only small risks as a result of long-term exposure. Commercially available protective masks have now been issued to British service personnel to reduce inhalation of hydrocarbons.

Mr. Colin Wallace

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason he specifically asked Mr. David Calcutt QC not to prepare a report, but simply to state his conclusions, on the Colin Wallace affair.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The terms of reference for Mr. Calcutt's investigation were set out in my statement to the House on 30 January last year at column 112. I undertook that his conclusions and recommendations would be made public, without publishing any classified matters or material. This is what has been done.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action he is taking in Kuwait to deal with (a) land mines on approach roads to oil fires and (b) mines hidden in lakes of oil.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: British forces are not involved in such work at present. However, we are considering the ways in which British forces might support the civil rehabilitation and reconstruction programme in Kuwait.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis for the years 1984-85 to 1993-94, using the support types of table 5.1 of Cm. 1520 supplemented by the categories of grant of table 5.2, of changes in central Government support for local authorities in the United Kingdom as a whole and by territory, (a) between table 21.4.1. of Cm. 1021 and table 5.1 of Cm. 1520 and (b) between table 5.1 of Cm. 1520 and the "Financial Report and Budget Statement" 1991-92.

Mr. Mellor: Information on differences between the figures for central Government support for local authorities given in the 1990 public expenditure White Paper—Cm. 1021—and the "Statistical Supplement to the 1990 Autumn Statement"—Cm. 1520—are given in the table. They are on the same basis as the information on differences from Cm. 1021 presented in the supplement, that is, they exclude differences arising from changes in the way expenditure is recorded—classification changes—or from transfers between departments or sectors, for example, switching responsibility for expenditure from central Government to local authorities. Corresponding analyses of differences between the supplement and the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" are not available. Details of changes since the supplement arising from the introduction of the community charge grant and the measures announced on 17 January to reduce the levels of community charges are set out in table 5.2 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

[1] The differences shown are differences after adjustments for changes of classification and switches between departments and spending sectors.

[2] Figures are rounded to the nearest £10 million or, in the case of totals for current grants outside AEF and totals including these grants, to the nearest £100 million.

[3] The differences shown for 1991-92 and 1992-93 are higher than the corresponding differences shown in the 1990 Autumn Statement (table 1.3) because they take account of a switch between revenue support grant and capital grants/credit approvals. This switch was below the threshold for which differences were adjusted in the Autumn Statement.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Research Bodies

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many publicly funded research centres or institutes are planned to (a) close, (b) merge and (c) open in the next five years.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This information is not available. Publicly funded research establishments vary from small units in higher education institutions to large institutes on a number of sites, and are run by a range of bodies including the research councils and universities.

Nuclear Structure Facility

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received since 8 February about the decision of the SERC to close the nuclear structure facility, Daresbury; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Since 8 February, my right hon. and learned Friend and I have received 350 representations about the nuclear structure facility at the SERC's Daresbury laboratory.

Teacher Grading

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many (a) men and (b) women teachers are on grades A, B, C, D and E allowances for each local education authority in England currently and for the last five years that figures are available for (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools.

Mr. Fallon [holding answer 18 April 1991]: I am arranging to place in the Library a copy of the relevant tables for March 1988, the first year following the introduction of incentive allowances in October 1987. Corresponding information for later years is not yet available.

Head Teachers

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many (a) men and (b) women head teachers and deputy head teachers are in place for each local education authority in England now and for the last five years that figures are available for (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools.

Mr. Fallon [holding answer 18 April 1991]: I am arranging to place in the Library a copy of the relevant tables for the years 1986 to 1988. Comparable figures for other years are not readily available.

Student Awards

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what parental contributions will be payable towards mandatory student awards in the academic year 1991-92.

Mr. Alan Howarth [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1991, col. 554]: I regret that the illustrative parental contribution scales which accompanied my previous reply contained some minor arithmetical errors. These errors would not have affected the assessments to be made in the summer by local education authorities, which will be based on the formulae quoted at the end of my previous reply. The formulae remain correct and will generally still keep the assessed contribution for 1991-92 at the same cash level as in 1990-91, as intended for a parent whose residual income has risen in line with average earnings.

For the avoidance of doubt, the corrected illustrative scales are shown below.

ENVIRONMENT

New Palace Yard (Lamps)

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why the gas lamps in New Palace Yard have been converted to electricity.

Mr. Yeo: The gas lamps in New Palace Yard have been temporarily replaced by electric lamps following the discovery of damage to the mains supply. As substantial excavation work will be required to lay a new main, the work has been deferred to the summer recess to minimise disruption. It is expected that the gas lamps will be back in use in September.

Community Charge (Lambeth)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much community charge has now been paid for the financial year ended 31 March in Lambeth.

Mr. Key: Local authorities are currently sending returns to my Department giving their community charge receipts up to 31 March 1991; no return has yet been received from Lambeth. To 31 December 1990 Lambeth had collected £24·3 million.

Rhododendrons

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in his Department in limiting the spread of rhododendrons as a threat to woodlands and wild landscapes.

Mr. Baldry: The Department has not carried out specific work on this subject, but the Forestry Commission is continuing research into methods of controlling rhododendron, and results are promising. Bulletin 73, Field Book 8 and Research Information Note 186, issued by the Commission, provide more detailed information about control on forest sites. I am arranging for a copy of each document to be placed in the Library of the House.

Advice Services

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent local authorities are making use of section 38 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The Department has no information on the extent to which local authorities are using this new power to help advice and assistance agencies.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has issued any advice to local authorities on section 38 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.

Mr. Portillo: A joint circular (Department of the Environment 23/90; Welsh Office 62/90) explained the impact of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 on parish, community and town councils. This drew attention to the new power for these authorities under section 38 to help advice and assistance agencies. Similar action seemed unnecessary for principal councils.

Housing Corporation Expenditure

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money has been spent by the Housing Corporation in (a) Stockton, (b) Middlesbrough and (c) Hartlepool; and how many dwellings have been improved or created in each of the last four years.

Mr. Yeo: This is a matter for the Housing Corporation. I have therefore asked the corporation to respond to my hon. Friend direct. The subsequent reply will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list all those areas in England and Wales for which planning permission has been granted for opencast mining.

Mr. Yeo: Information on the areas in England and Wales where planning permission has been granted for opencast mining is not held centrally. According to statistics published by the County Planning Officers Society 41 sites in England and Wales received approval in 1989-90 (including on appeal) as follows:

	Number
Durham	10
Northumberland	1
Tyne and Wear	1
Cumbria	1
Leicestershire	2
Staffordshire	1
Shropshire	4
West Midlands	2
Derbyshire	6
South Yorkshire	3
West Yorkshire	3

Rose Theatre Trust

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the Rose Theatre Trust to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Sir George Young: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 3 June to 7 June.

TRANSPORT

Railway Property (Child Trespassers)

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many children have been (a) killed and (b) seriously injured in each of the past 10 years for which figures are available in consequence of electrocution or being struck by a train while trespassing on railway property.

Mr. Freeman: Figures for the period 1980-89 are given in the table; 1989 is the latest year for which figures are available.

SCOTLAND

Local Authority Spending

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much is spent by each local authority per person on (a) the mentally ill and (b) the elderly.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information for the elderly derived from the local authority financial returns is set out in the table. It is not possible to provide meaningful information for the mentally ill since the expenditure is not always separately identified.

Local authority expenditure per head on the elderly: 1988-89

Region	Elderly £
Borders	37·0
Central	33·5
Dumfries and Galloway	28·1
Fife	41·7
Grampian	32·2
Highland	31·1
Lothian	34·6
Strathclyde	37·1
Tayside	40·7
Orkney	68·2
Western Isles	94·1

Note: This expenditure information relates to services paid for by social work authorities and used in the main by the elderly. It does not include administration and casework expenditure by these authorities in relation to the elderly since that is difficult to identify. Expenditure by housing authorities on services of benefit to the elderly is not included.

Cancer

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list for each year from 1986 onwards the number of cancer-related deaths in (a) Scotland, (b) Forth Valley health board area, (c) Falkirk district, (d) the postal district FK4, (e) the postal district FK5 and (f) the postal district FK6.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of deaths attributed to cancer (ICD* numbers 140-208) as the underlying cause of death is shown in the table.

Place of Safety Orders (Orkney)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will hold an inquiry into the events surrounding the place of stafety orders recently taken in respect of nine children in Orkney.

Mr. Lang: Once the legal proceedings in relation to this case are completed, it is my intention to hold a full judicial inquiry. At that stage I will make an announcement about the terms of reference and who will lead it.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Kurdish Refugees

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all United Kingdom emergency relief for refugees from Iraq; from which ODA budget the aid is paid; and whether the ODA's budget for 1991-92 has been increased to cover the cost of emergency aid for Iraqi refugees.

Mrs. Chalker: Total commitments for relief operations for refugees from Iraq in 1990-91 are estimated at £18·37 million. £3·25 million has been paid from the ODA's humanitarian aid subhead A3(9), and £2·5 million for ICRC from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office vote, clases II, vote 5. The remainder is our estimated share of EC budgetary expenditure and will be attributed to the aid programme in the usual way. The £18·37 million was allocated as follows:

August 1990:—£2 million to the International Organisation for Migration.

August 1990:—£0·5 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross and Jordanian Red Crescent.

August 1990:—£0·25 million relief supplies from the United Kingdom.

August 1990:—£8·25 million through the European Community

January 1991:—US$1 million to United Nations Disaster Relief Organisation.

February 1991:—£2·5 million to International Committee of the Red Cross Gulf Appeal

January-March 1991:—£4·37 million through the European Community.

Commitments so far in this financial year total £21·65 million, excluding the cost of RAF airdrops and airlift operations.

Specific allocations are:

April 1991—£0·5 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross.

April 1991—£336,000 for relief supply flights to Turkey on 5 April.

April 1991—£350,000 for relief supply flights to Iran on 9 April and 10 April.

April 1991—£30,000 grants each to Save the Children Fund and CARE (UK) for food purchases via the Turkish Red Crescent Society.

April 1991—£50,000 grant to OXFAM for relief supply flights.

April 1991—£650,000 through the European Community.

Our initial assistance of over £1 million in April 1991 is being met from funds earmarked for disaster relief in the ODA's contingency reserve, provision for which is in subhead A3(7). Of the £20 million announced by the Prime Minister on 5 April, £8 million is being drawn from the aid programme contingency reserve. The balance of £12 million is our estimated share of EC budgetary expenditure and will be attributed to the aid programme.

The United Kingdom is also providing daily relief supply flights to Turkey. Supplies are being distributed by Hercules aircraft and Chinook helicopters based at Dyarbakir. The costs of these airlift and helicopter operations are estimated at £1·5 million per week. Two further relief supply flights will leave for Iran on 18 April and 19 April. More will follow. The costs of these operations are also being met from the aid programme contingency reserve.

ODA's budget for 1991-92 has not been increased further to meet the costs of these relief operations. But, as I made clear to the Foreign Affairs Committee on 17 April, the Government will look sympathetically at the case for extra money.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Children

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what provision is made for the welfare and care of children in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Belgium, (c) Denmark, (d) Luxembourg, (e) the Netherlands, (f) Germany and (g) France.

Mr. Jack: This Department makes provision for the welfare and care of children to the extent that it provides cash benefits to families with children, principally through the child benefit, family credit and income support schemes.

Tables giving details of child benefit and equivalent schemes in the countries listed by the hon. Member, as at 1 July 1990, are set out in "Social Protection in the Member States of the Community", published by the Commission for the European Communities, a copy of which is in the Library. The current publication does not cover income-related benefits such as family credit (a benefit which has no direct equivalent in the other countries) but the United Kingdom has proposed to the Commission that next year and in following years the tables should be extended to cover these benefits. Until this can be done a systematic comparison of this type of benefit is not possible.

Disability Benefit

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will conduct a comprehensive review of disability benefits arising from the OPCS surveys on disabilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The reports produced by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys provided us with an unprecedented volume of information about the financial circumstances of people with disabilities. We invited and received comments on these reports from large numbers of organisations and took their views into account before publishing our proposals in "The Way Ahead" (Cm. 917). We have since invited further comments on the documents we published last year outlining our more detailed proposals for both the new benefits. We received more than 70 replies.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those organisations which have made representations to him requesting that the disability living allowance be available to those who become disabled after the age of 85 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: No such representations have been received.

Social Fund

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the amount spent on the social fund relative to the amount paid in single payments for the last year in which the single payment scheme operated, expressed in comparable prices and as a percentage reduction.

Mr. Scott: Direct comparisons between single payments expenditure in 1987-88 and social fund expenditure in 1990-91 are misleading because of the differing scope of the two schemes. Funeral and maternity payments were not part of the single payments scheme in 1987-88 but have been included in the table in order to make the comparison with social fund expenditure in 1990-91 more meaningful.

	Cash £ million	At 1990-91 prices £ million
Single payments 1987-88	[1]243	[2]299
Social fund 1990-91[3]	—	282
		5½ per cent. reduction

PRIME MINISTER

Computers

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what steps are being taken to ensure that no Government Department makes use of any pirated copies of Inslaw case-tracking Promis software.

The Prime Minister: All Government Departments operate their information technology systems within the law. To reinforce this, Departments have issued internal notices warning of the consequences of using unlicensed software.

Iraq

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards ensuring that the leaders of the regime in Iraq are tried for crimes against humanity; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Saddam Hussein bears personal responsibility under international law for his crimes and is responsible for those of his subordinates acting under his orders. In the case of both war crimes and genocide Saddam Hussein can, in law, be brought to trial before a national court or international tribunal. We and our EC partners have asked the United Nations Secretary-General to investigate how this might be achieved.

Interception Commissioner

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Prime Minister when the Commissioner appointed under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 will present his annual report; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: A copy of Lord Justice Lloyd's fifth annual report for 1990 has been laid before the House today in accordance with section 8(7) of the Interception of Communications Act 1985. The confidential appendix to the report has been excluded from that copy in accordance with section 8(8) of the 1985 Act. I am grateful to the Commissioner for his work in reviewing the issue of warrants and note that he remains satisfied that the Secretaries of State continue to exercise scrupulous care in the issue of warrants. Careful consideration is being given to both parts of the Commissioner's report.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Alphachloralose

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food under what circumstances Alphachloralose can be used as a rodenticide.

Mr. Maclean: As from 1 March, Alphachloralose may be used as a rodenticide only when contained in a product approved under the Control of Pesticide Regulations for that purpose, of which there are currently seven. Use of these is governed by specified conditions which must be listed on labels, and which include the restriction that they are for use only as rodenticides.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Single Market

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report the short title of each of the European Community directives to implement the single market which should be on the statute book of each of the European Community member states; and what progress each such state had made by 31 December 1990 to enact into their domestic law such legislation.

Mr. Sainsbury: The latest information giving a detailed breakdown of the situation on implementation of the individual measures in the Commission White Paper programme which were due to enter into force by the end of 1990 are given in annex 1 to document 9258/90 dated 5 October 1990, a copy of which is deposited in the Library. This confirms the United Kingdom's good record with only 18 out of 107 measures not implemented. A comparative table for all member states, together with more recent figures provided by the Commission are given in the table.

	Unimplemented measures[1]	Unofficial assessment[2]
Denmark	15	20
United Kingdom	18	28
Germany (F.R.)	20	32

Somalia (Tobacco Imports)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much of the £3,436,000 beverages and tobacco exports to Somalia in 1990 was tobacco.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information requested is published in Business Monitor MM20 Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom for December 1990, table v, page 17, a copy of which is in the Library.

Sheffield Forgemaster

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the chemical specification of the steel ordered for the manufacture by Sheffield Forgemaster of the so-called super gun.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 18 April 1991]: I have nothing to add to the reply given by my right hon. Friend on 12 December 1990 at cols. 412-13.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Petroleum Duty

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on European Commission proposals for minimum rates and target rates of petrol duty.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The European Commission proposed minimum rates for mineral oils, including leaded and unleaded petrol, in December 1989. An explanatory memorandum on this proposal was submitted on 19 February 1990 (document 9777/89 COM (89) 526 final).

On 19 February 1991 the Commission issued a further duty rates proposal (document 4822/91 COM (91) 43 final) which, for leaded and unleaded petrol, complemented the 1989 proposals by setting target rates. An explanatory memorandum on the proposal was submitted on 17 April 1991.

Copies of the explanatory memoranda are in the Library.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Bellott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to ensure that second-hand goods retain zero rate of value added tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The only zero rate of value added tax on goods solely because they are second-hand applies to donated goods sold by charity shops. There are, however, special schemes for accounting for tax on some second-hand goods. I have no plans to change either system.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rate of value added tax is payable on work done or services provided in the period up to 31 March 1991.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Traders are entitled to charge the old rate (15 per cent.) on goods or services supplied up to 31 March. This applies even where a tax invoice is issued after that date in respect of such goods and services. Normally, this would create a tax point at the new rate, but the law includes a concession which allows traders to apply the old rate.

Baby Yarns

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will zero-rate baby yarns for the purpose of VAT.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: No. Although under the EC VAT sixth directive member states are able to retain zero rates which were in force on 31 December 1975, subject to their being for clearly defined social reasons and for the benefit of the final consumer, they may neither widen the scope of existing zero rates nor introduce new ones.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Cats and Dogs (Experimentation)

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what action is taken to ensure that the cats and dogs supplied by suppliers given temporary licences under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 to supply non purpose-bred cats and dogs to designated establishments are not strays or were not originally stolen;

(2) on what grounds temporary suppliers' licences are granted under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 to suppliers of non purpose-bred dogs, including ex-racing greyhounds.

Mrs. Rumbold: Certificates of designation issued under secton 7 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 to breeding and supplying establishments are not granted on a temporary basis. Exemptions may be granted to the standard condition applying to such certificates, which requires that animals must be obtained from designated breeding and supplying establishments. Breeding establishments have been granted exemptions to obtain dogs from non-designated sources only for use as breeding stock.

Exemptions may also be granted to the requirement in section 10(3) of the Act applying to project licences that only those cats and dogs specially bred for and obtained from designated sources may be used in scientific procedures. No exemptions have been granted to allow the use of cats obtained from non-designated sources at designated user establishments.

Where there is a shortage of certain types of purpose-bred dogs for use in research, it is necessary to grant some exemptions. Care is taken to ensure that greyhounds obtained from non-designated sources are neither pets nor ex-racing greyhounds which have been supplied to charitable bodies as pets.

The conditions applied to licences and certificates ensure that stray or stolen cats or dogs cannot be legitimately supplied for use in regulated procedures.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will identify the National Greyhound Racing Club licensed trainer who has been licensed to supply ex-racing greyhounds to the Royal Postgraduate Medical School for use in animal procedures:

(2) if he will identify all sources of greyhounds and other dogs supplied to the Royal Postgraduate Medical School for use in animal procedures.

Mrs. Rumbold: No certificate of designation has been granted under section 7 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 for the supply of ex-racing greyhounds to the Royal Postgraduate Medical School for use in scientific procedures. Exemptions have been granted at the Royal Postgraduate Medical School to obtain a limited number of greyhounds from non-designated sources for a limited period.

It is not our practice to give details of the sources of animals supplied for use in scientific procedures. The RPMS intends to use specially bred greyhounds which are expected to become available during the summer. In the meantime, we understand that the RPMS has agreed with the NGRC not to use greyhounds which have raced on licensed tracks.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many suppliers to establishments licensed to carry out procedures under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 are licensed to supply non purpose-bred cats and dogs; what numbers of such animals were supplied to British laboratories last year; and if he will publish details in the annual statistics of scientific procedures on living animals.

Mrs. Rumbold: Exemptions for project licence-holders to acquire dogs from non-designated suppliers have been granted in only a very small number of cases. No exemptions have been granted for cats.

Statistics on the total number of animals supplied are not available centrally and there are no plans to collect them for publication in the annual Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many inspections of suppliers given temporary licences under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 to supply non purpose-bred cats and dogs to designated establishments are made each year by the Home Office inspectorate.

Mrs. Rumbold: Inspectors have powers to inspect only designated establishments. Exemptions have been granted to enable project licence-holders at scientific procedure establishments to obtain animals from non-designated sources. If questions were to arise about the health or quality of the animals, exemptions would not be granted or would be withdrawn.

Police Operations

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been killed in police pursuits (a) excluding and (b) including police officers in each of the last five years in England and Wales, respectively.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information for 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990 is contained in the reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary for those years, copies of which are in the Library. This information was not recorded centrally in 1986 and earlier years and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

WALES

Drinking Water (Lead Pollution)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the number of houses in Wales that have drinking water containing lead levels above those permitted by EC standards; and if he will indicate the location of those properties.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested is not centrally available.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of houses in Wales that would be required to remove lead plumbing if the permitted level of lead in drinking water is changed from 0·05 mg per litre to 0·01 mg per litre.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information is held by his Department on the number of houses in Wales having lead plumbing.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Welsh House Condition Survey for 1981 estimated that 188,400 houses in Wales had lead plumbing.

Public Registers

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish all those locations in Wales where the public can examine the public registers held by (a) the National Rivers Authority and (b) the Welsh Water Company.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The locations are as follows:

(a) Caernarfon, Cardiff, Haverfordwest, Lampeter, Mold, Monmouth, Swansea.

(b) Aberaeron, Bangor, Brecon, Haverfordwest, Mold, Nelson, Swansea.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the cost of decontaminating all contaminated land in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not available.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what discussions he has had with the chairman of the South Glamorgan health authority concerning the completion of treatment as in-patients for those presently undergoing treatment at the children's ward, Prince of Wales orthopaedic hospital, Rhydlafar, near Cardiff, on or shortly after its announced closure date of 30 April;

(2) if he will issue guidelines to health authorities to which he has granted consent to close wards or hospitals not to implement those closures until the in-patients in situ have completed their in-patient treatment.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: As the implementation of approved service changes is a matter for health authorities, I have not discussed the timing of the transfer of the children's orthopaedic service in South Glamorgan with the chairman of the district health authority. Nor do I have plans to issue any general guidance on this particular aspect of service planning.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he proposes to take to alleviate short-term cash flow difficulties experienced by local authorities in Wales as a result of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act 1991.

Mr. David Hunt: I announced on 19 March my intention to pay community charge grant to Welsh local authorities in accordance with the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act 1991. Parliamentary approval of this new expenditure will be sought in a supplementary estimate on the rate rebates, Wales vote, class XVI, vote 11.

Pending that approval, urgent expenditure is being met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund. An advance of £45 million has already been made to cover

DEFENCE

Aldermaston

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the welding fault problems in the A90 and A91 buildings at Aldermaston.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The work to rectify problems associated with welds in A90 was completed in April 1990. Further details may be found in the evidence given by my Department to the Select Committee on Defence and published in the reports "The progress of the Trident Programme", 5th of Session 1988-89 and 9th of Session 1989-90 (HC 374 and HC 237). During the commissioning of the A91 facility a different problem has been identified associated with corrosion in pipework and vessels. The problem is being investigated and solutions identified.

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the A90 building is to be closed either fully or partially; and what will happen to staff at Aldermaston.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: No. The problem associated with corrosion in pipework and vessels is in the A91 facility and not A90. As a result the training schedules of a small number of the future operators of A91 are being revised whilst the problem is investigated.

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the present problems at Aldermaston will affect the timetable for the Trident warhead production.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We do not expect any adverse effect on the Trident warhead production programme.

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the cost of rectifying the problems on the A90 and A91 buildings at Aldermaston.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The work to rectify the problems in A90 was completed in April 1990. It is not the practice to disclose details of individual contract costs for reasons of commercial confidentiality. Further details may be found in the evidence given by my Department to the Select Committee on Defence and published in the reports "The progress of the Trident Programme", 5th of Session 1988-89 and 9th of Session 1989-90 (HC 374 and HC 237). The investigations into the problems with A91 are at an early stage and it is not yet possible to estimate the cost of any corrective action that may be necessary.

Main Battle Tank

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) of 19 March, Official Report column 90, if he is now in a position to say when he expects to announce which company has been chosen to provide main battle tanks to replace the Chieftain tank.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have nothing to add to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) on 19 March at column 90.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Madden: To ask the Attorney-General what is the average time between (a) a request for a hearing date and (b) a hearing date being set for immigration appeals in Leeds.

The Attorney-General: The average time between a request for a hearing date and a hearing date being set for immigration appeals in Leeds is estimated to be five to six months.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Attorney-General what action is being taken to reduce delays in hearing immigration appeals in Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor's Department is actively considering increasing the number of hearing rooms available at Coronet house, Leeds for hearing immigration appeals, and has since 1989 increased the number of staff and adjudicators at Leeds. It is also planned to establish a permanent centre in Scotland for processing Scottish immigration appeals which will reduce the workload and pressure at the Leeds centre, which currently processess Scottish appeals. The Lord Chancellor's Department is also keeping under review facilities and staffing levels at all hearing centres in light of the increasing number of appeals.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Attorney-General what action is being taken to reduce delays in immigration appeal papers, received in London from British overseas posts, being forwarded to the representatives of the parties; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The immigration appellate authorities have recently introduced streamlined procedures for the initial collation and dispatch of appeal papers received at Thanat house from posts overseas, and now aim to dispatch them to the parties representatives in this country within three weeks of their receipt. This is a significant improvement on the previous position of eight to 12 weeks.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Attorney-General when the appeal of Mr. Mohammed Ashraf (TH/13446190) against refusal to grant him entry clearance to the United Kingdom is to be heard in Leeds; when he first applied to enter the United Kingdom; when he was interviewed by the British high commission in Islamabad; when his appeal was received by the post; when his papers were received in London; when papers were sent to Mr. Ashraf's representative; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The immigration appellate authorities (IAA) expect the appeal of Mr. Mohammed Ashraf to be heard in Leeds in September 1991. Mr. Ashraf applied to enter the United Kingdom on 28 November 1988, and was interviewed by the entry clearance officer at Islamabad on 14 December 1989 and 3 May 1990. The entry clearance officer refused Mr. Ashraf's application on 24 May 1990 and on 4 July 1990 the high commission at Islamabad received Mr. Ashraf's appeal. The IAA in London received Mr. Ashraf's appeal papers on 16 August 1990 and after collating them the IAA sent the case papers to Mr. Ashraf's representatives in this country on 13 November 1990. On 1 March 1991 Mr. Ashraf's representatives indicated to the IAA that they are ready to proceed to hearing.

The delay in the listing of this case at Leeds is regrettable and the Lord Chancellor's Department is currently taking steps to increase the hearing room capacity of the Leeds centre in order to reduce delays there.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Attorney-General how many (a) staff and (b) adjudicators are retained in Leeds concerned with immigration appeals; and if he will give figures for the comparable period of the last three years.

The Attorney-General: The information requested is as follows:

April	Staff in post	Adjudicators
		Full-time	Part-time
1988	6	1	9
1989	6½	1	9
1990	6½	1	13
1991	8	1	13

Mr. Madden: To ask the Attorney-General how many immigration appeals in Leeds were in the past three years, to date, (a) heard and (b) adjourned at the request of the parties or for other reasons; and what is the average delay between a hearing and determination being issued.

The Attorney-General: The immigration appellate authorities (IAA) do not record details of the number of appeals adjourned.

The number of immigration appeals heard in Leeds in the past three calendar years is as follows:

	Number
1988	[1]926
1989	1,513
1990	1,276

[1] The figure for 1988 includes cases heard in Scotland.

Adjudicators at Leeds are on average able to prepare their determination within four weeks of the hearing. Thereafter, it takes on average two or three weeks for the determination to be typed and issued to the parties.

EMPLOYMENT

Mining (Hazardous Substances)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will bring forward legislation to enable the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations 1988 to be applied to mining in deep mines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The Health and Safety Commission has made no proposals to my right hon. and learned Friend concerning the application of the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations 1988 underground in mines. However, the Health and Safety Executive is currently reviewing mining legislation. In the course of the review it will consider whether it is now appropriate to apply these regulations below ground.

Dock Accidents

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many accidents were reported to the Health and Safety Executive in (a) Grimsby and Immingham docks, (b) Hull docks and (c) London docks in each year for 1979 and 1990 inclusive.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The following table shows the number of injuries occurring in the sea transport, port and inland water transport industries in (a) Grimsby and Immingham (b) Hull and (c) London reported to the Health and Safety Executive's factory and agricultural inspectorates between 1986/87 and 1989/90 (provisional) under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985.

Unit Labour Costs

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the percentage change in unit labour costs in (a) Britain and (b) Germany in the last 12 months.

Mr. Jackson: Unit wage costs in mining and manufacturing in the former Federal Republic of Germany rose by 1·9 per cent. in the year to the third quarter of 1990, which is the latest available information. In the same period unit wage costs in manufacturing in the United Kingdom rose by 9·3 per cent.

Employment Training

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the qualifications that were achieved by clients for each six-month period of employment training since its inception.

Mr. Jackson: The following table gives the percentage breakdown of the qualifications gained by trainees leaving employment training between July 1989 and September 1990.

Employment training

Note: Percentage totals add up to more than 100 per cent. because trainees may obtain more than one type of qualification.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of employment training trainees had employer placements in each month since the scheme's inception.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not available in the precise format requested.

However, information is available quarterly as shown in the table.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what matters he has discussed with the group of 10 TEC chairmen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: I have discussed a number of issues relating to training and enterprise and the framework within which TECs operate with the group of 10 TEC chairmen. I find these meetings particularly useful as a way of hearing views directly from TEC chairmen.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many non-seconded staff are directly employed by TECs.

Mr. Jackson: As at 10 April 1991, 216 staff were employed by training and enterprise councils, in publicly funded posts. TECs are also able to employ other directly recruited staff using their own resources.

Youth Training

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people under 18 years in the London borough of Newham who are not employed have not had a youth training opportunity offered to them.

Mr. Jackson: The London borough of Newham is part of the area covered by the London East training and enterprise council. LETEC has a clear contractual duty to ensure that every young person under 18 not in school or a job who is seeking YT entry should have the offer, and if necessary re-offers of a suitable training place. LETEC has approached the local careers service seeking further information on the position in Newham. LETEC and the Employment Department are jointly committed to maintaining the YT guarantee.

Employment Service

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of unemployed claimants receive caseload treatment by the Employment Service.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage increase in funding the Employment Service has received to cope with increased unemployment.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. and learned Friend announced on 20 March that the Employment Service was to receive £55 million in extra resources for 1991-92 to help unemployed people back to work. This represents an increase of some 8 per cent. in the Employment Service's running costs.

Training Programmes (Expenditure)

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the level at 1991 prices of Government expenditure on special employment and training programmes in 1988-89.

Mr. Jackson: Government expenditure on special employment and training programmes in 1988-89 was £3,091·6 million at 1991-92 prices.

Payment of Accounts

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he has taken to assist the self-employed small business person to obtain timely payment of legitimate accounts rendered to large companies.

Mr. Jackson: Cash flow is a vital factor in the efficient running of all businesses, and any delays in obtaining payment for work done are particularly damaging for self-employed people and small businesses. It is vital that large companies recognise their responsibilities to small suppliers by settling accounts promptly.

The Government are therefore taking action to strengthen their encouragement of the voluntary adoption of good payment practice and to foster closer co-operation betweeen buyers and sellers.

As part of this initiative, my Department will shortly be issuing a revised booklet on credit management for small firms, and is sponsoring a new guide on good payment practice by the Institute of Credit Management which will be specifically aimed at larger companies. These publications will be widely distributed and publicised.

The Government themselves are giving a further lead. Each of the major spending Departments will be monitoring its own payment performance this year, and the results will be published.

HEALTH

Cholesterol

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he has any plans to launch a national education programme, similar to those in the United States, relating to consumer awareness of cholesterol levels;

(2) what guidance his Department gives on the issue of whether, independently of lowering dietary fat intake, increased consumption of oat bran can reduce blood cholesterol; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what information his Department holds on a causal link between high blood cholesterol levels and coronary heart disease;

(4) if he has evaluated the relative cost-effectiveness of (a) treatment and (b) public health programmes designed to lower blood cholesterol.

Mr. Dorrell: The Standing Medical Advisory Committee reported last year on the cost-effectiveness of opportunistic cholesterol testing, a copy of which is available in the Library. Annex 1 to the report details evidence from a large number of studies showing "a direct and consistent association between blood cholesterol levels and the incidence of coronary heart disease. This association has all the characteristics of a causal relationship".

Because the committee identified divergent medical opinion in this area, it was decided to issue the report for widespread consultation. A large number of responses has been received and these are now being analysed. We expect to be in a position to reach conclusions on the findings soon.

Recommendations in the report have implications for a national education programme. In considering the results of the consultation exercise we will have regard to the need for public education specifically about cholesterol levels.

The Government already give advice on healthy eating which encourages the adoption of a balanced overall diet. Oat bran, like any other food, can form part of a healthy diet. There is insufficient evidence at present to give specific advice about the role of oat bran in reducing blood cholesterol.

Passive Smoking

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has received the Health Education Authority's report on passive smoking; and what response he will make to its findings and recommendations.

Mr. Dorrell: We welcome the publication of this report.

The Government have for some time publicised the dangers of passive smoking and encouraged the introduction of smoking policies in the workplace and in public places. By providing clear and up-to-date information, the booklet serves to keep the issue in the public eye and to maintain the progress which is being made.

Adoption

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the review of inter-country adoption will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The first consultative document of the adoption law review, "The nature and effect of adoption—discussion paper No. 1", a copy of which is available in the Library, has been issued and the responses are being considered. Further consultative documents will follow including one on inter-country adoption.

Issue of this paper has been deferred until after the meeting of the special commission of the Hague conference on private international law which begins on 22 April so that a preliminary report of the outcome of the meeting can be included in the law review paper and comments sought.

Kidney Disease

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of renal dialysis units and nephrologists within (a) Wessex regional health authority and (b) other regional health authorities within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: The table shows the number of NHS dialysis and transplant units and nephrologists employed by region in England, and the totals for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Region	Number of Renal Dialysis/ Transplant Units	Number of Nephrologists (and Whole time equiv's)

Scotland	13	17	(17·0)
Northern Ireland	1	11	(11·0)

Manpower figures include permanent paid and honorary staff.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of surviving renal transplant patients per million population within Wessex regional health authority; and what is the United Kingdom average per million.

Mr. Dorrell: Information is not available in the form requested. According to the latest information provided by the United Kingdom transplant support services, the patient survival rate one year after transplantation in 1987-88 was 88 per cent. for Wessex and 92 per cent. for the United Kingdom.

This information is based on a follow-up study of 1,750 patients, including 74 in Wessex, receiving first cadaveric kidney transplants.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the demand for renal services within Wessex regional health authority; and what is the relative rate of treatment per million population for end-stage renal failure in Wessex and other regional health authorities within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: No assessment specific to Wessex has been undertaken. The need for renal services will be reviewed as part of the purchasing process in 1991-92. These services have expanded steadily in Wessex over the last few years, and no patient whom consultants believe to require treatment has knowingly been turned away.

According to information provided by the European Dialysis and Transplant Association, the number of new patients per million population accepted for treatment of end-stage renal failure during 1988, the last year for which complete data are available, by regional health authority is as follows:

Region	Treatment for end stage renal failure in 1988 (pmp)
Wessex	44·8
Northern	58·4
Yorkshire	44·2
Trent	49·1
East Anglia	65·0

British Fluoridation Society

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the benefit accruing from the annual grant made to the British Fluoridation Society.

Mr. Dorrell: The British Fluoridation Society receives a grant under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 for its work in providing support by means of information, advice, materials and other assistance to regional health authorities considering the implementation of water fluoridation in their areas. We are satisfied that the grant represents good value for money.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hostages

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards the release of John McCarthy, Terry Waite and other hostages held in the middle east.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We continue to make every effort in our contacts with the Iranian authorities, who we believe to have a decisive influence, to secure the release of the hostages. We have also contacted other countries, and the EC troika, to reinforce the point in their own dealings with Iran.

Kuwait

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning abuses of human rights and rapes of Palestinian and Filipino women in Kuwait; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None.

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what information he has on the number of settlers going into northern Cyprus from Turkey in each of the last five years;

(2) what discussions he has had with the Turkish Government as to their policy of allowing Turkish nationals to settle in northern Cyprus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: There is no reliable information on the number of Turkish settlers in northern Cyprus.

All parties to the intercommunal dispute are aware that this issue will have to be addressed in the context of the comprehensive, just and lasting settlement for which the UN Secretary-General is working, with our full support.

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has had discussions with the Government of Cyprus about the build-up of arms in that country.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It is our long-standing policy to sell weapons neither to the Greek Cypriot National Guard nor to the Turkish Cypriot armed forces. The Cyprus Government are aware of our view that the continuation of arms purchases does not assist the UN Secretary-General's search for a comprehensive settlement of the Cyprus problem.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the involved parties in Cyprus as to the rights of ownership of land and property in that country; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The issue of property and land ownership rights is a key element in the current efforts by the UN Secretary-General to resolve the intercommunal dispute in Cyprus. We have been in close touch with the parties to the dispute on this and other issues.

Kurds

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he intends to call for a middle east peace conference to discuss the creation of a national home for the Kurds.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have made clear our desire to see the political and human rights of the Kurdish people fully respected within existing international boundaries. It is evident from our discussions with Iraqi Kurdish leaders that they seek genuine autonomy within Iraq, not the creation of a separate Kurdish state.

East Timor

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise at the United Nations Human Rights Commission the treatment of East Timorese citizens by the Indonesian Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I can confirm that this matter was raised by the EC Presidency statement during the 47th session of the UN Human Rights Commission, which included a reference to the situation in East Timor.

Mauritius

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for entry into the United Kingdom have been refused by the British high commission in Mauritius in each of the last five years.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The number of applications for entry into the United Kingdom refused by the high commission in Mauritius in each of the last five years is as follows:

Year	Total
1986	202
1987	237
1988	195
1989	183
1990	206

South Atlantic (Oil Exploration)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has of any interest shown in oil exploration in the south Atlantic.

Mr. Garel-Jones: A number of seismic survey companies have shown interest over the years in carrying out oil exploration in the south Atlantic.

Commonwealth

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the aims and objectives of Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the Commonwealth.

Mrs. Chalker: Our aim is to maintain and foster the special relationship we share with Commonwealth partners. The Commonwealth can play an increasingly constructive and moderating role in world affairs. We hope that Commonwealth partners will work to strengthen the global trend towards pluralist democratic and accountable government.

Nigel Bramble

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking or will be taking to assist Nigel Bramble, aged 14 years and severely handicapped, from the British dependency of Montserrat, to complete his schooling in the United Kingdom before returning with his mother to the dependency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Nigel Bramble is currently studying at a state school which has the facilities to cater for his special educational and medical needs. His mother has applied to regularise their immigration status. We have been in touch with the Home Office. Given the circumstances surrounding the case, they have given an assurance that we would not seek to remove Nigel Bramble and his mother from the United Kingdom. I have asked my officials to discuss this with officials of the Home Office, the Department of Education and the Department of Health.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if appropriate provision is available for Nigel Bramble, aged 14 years and severely handicapped, born in the British dependency of Montserrat, to complete his schooling in the dependency if he is forced to return there from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There is a school for children with special needs in Montserrat, which Nigel Bramble attended until June 1990. It is, however, the view of local and visiting British medical consultants that the school has nothing further to offer Nigel, given its limited resources.

Dependent Territories

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action has been taken in regard to the United Nations convention on the rights of the child as it applies to educational provision in Britain's dependent territories; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Neither the United Kingdom nor the Dependent Territories have yet ratified the convention.

Brazil

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has (a) received and (b) made to the Brazilian Government in connection with human rights concerns regarding protection by federal police of rural workers facing death threats.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We are in regular touch with the Brazilian authorities and with NGOs in UK regarding the human rights situation in Brazil. No specific representations have been made to the Brazilian Government on the circumstances of rural workers.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Brazilian Government in connection with human rights concerns about federal police protection for Fr. Ricardo Figuera, Carlos Cabral Pereira, Sebastiao Vieira da Silva, Roberto Neto da Silva, Fr. Vardario Lopes Costa and Orlando Canuto Pereira, who are involved with representation of Rio Maria rural workers.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Her Majesty's embassy in Brasilia is looking into the cases of those mentioned and I look forward to receiving their report.

Hong Kong

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer, Official Report, column 112, of 15 April, if he will estimate the number of sharks represented by the import of 3,838 tonnes of shark fins into Hong Kong in 1990.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It is difficult, if not impossible, to estimate the number of sharks represented by the weight of shark fins imported into Hong Kong in 1990 since

(a) the imported fins are obtained from sharks of different species and different maturity; and

(b) the fins vary widely in size and weight.

Iraq

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what conditions Her Majesty's Government laid down prior to 15 April for Iraq's compliance with basic human rights law in dealing with the insurrection in the north and south; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We expect Iraq to live up to its international obligations under the Geneva conventions, the international convention on civil and political rights and the genocide convention. In addition, SCR 688, adopted on 5 April, demands that the Iraqi Government stop their repression of their own people.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what powers are vested in the International Atomic Energy Agency to prevent the diversion of nuclear materials from civil to military use in the time between its regular inspections.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: If there were reason to believe that materials were being diverted from civil to military uses, the IAEA could request a special inspection.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what communications took place between Her Majesty's Government and the International Atomic Energy Agency regarding Iraqi efforts to operate a covert nuclear weapons programme prior to 15 January 1991.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have made known on a number of occasions in various ways our concerns that Iraq appeared to be pursuing a covert nuclear weapons programme in contravention of its obligations under the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions took place at the International Atomic Energy Agency regarding the movement of Iraqi safeguarded materials away from Tuwaila.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Any formal discussion of this matter would have to take place in the IAEA board of governors. There has been no discussion of this kind.

Iraq (Uranium)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's assessment as to the quantity of highly-enriched uranium that is still in Iraqi hands.

Turkey (Human Rights)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning abuse of human rights in Turkey.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Since the return to civilian rule in 1983, the Turkish Government have taken a number of steps to improve their human rights record. We support those efforts and continue to encourage the Turkish Government to respect and abide by the international human rights conventions to which they are a party.

United Nations

Mr. Garel-Jones: The end of the cold war has enhanced the prospects of having the United Nations function as its founding fathers intended. We are considering ways in which it might do so.

Israel

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government are making to the Israeli Government to reopen educational institutions in the occupied territories; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Israelis are well aware of our belief that the continuing closure of educational institutions, and in particular four universities, in the occupied territories is damaging—whether to Israel's reputation, the Palestinian community or the prospects for peace. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs urged the Israeli Foreign Minister to look again at this problem the last time he saw him, in London on 5 March.

Visa Arrangements

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reciprocal arrangements exist for British citizens to have two-year working visas and in which Commonwealth countries; and whether he has any proposals for renegotiating these arrangements.

Mr. Garel-Jones: There are no reciprocal arrangements between the United Kingdom and Commonwealth countries on two-year working visas. There are no plans to negotiate such arrangements.

Gulf War

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the latest figures for the total contributions to Her Majesty's Government, and from which countries, to the cost of the United Kingdom's involvement in the Gulf war.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Cash contributions paid and pledged so far include about £660 million from Kuwait, £565 million from Saudi Arabia, £275 million from Germany, £250 million from the UAE, £183 million from Japan, £15 million from Belgium, £15 million from Hong Kong and £8 million from Denmark. We have also received assistance in kind worth about £250 million from some 16 countries.

United Nations Disaster Relief Organisation

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his oral answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 35, what refugee movements were anticipated by the United Nations Disaster Relief Organisation, what requests were made to member states, and on what specific dates.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On 11 January the office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator launched a regional plan of action in anticipation that a large number of people would be displaced by a conflict in the Gulf. This plan was based on 100,000 refugees arriving in each of Jordan, Turkey, Iran and Syria. UNDRO, on behalf of the United Nations humanitarian agencies and the International Organisation for Migration, made an urgent appeal for United States $38 million, 25 per cent. of their anticipated costs. Pledges from the international community quickly totalled some United States $58 million. The United Kingdom donated United States $1 million.

On 5 April UNDRO asked donors for the remaining 75 per cent. of its 11 January appeal. On 9 April, as the full scale of the exodus in the north of Iraq became clear, UNDRO launched an updated plan covering assistance to 1·5 million refugees in Turkey and Iran. UNDRO estimated the cost of its programme at United States $400 million, subsuming its original appeal for United States $152 million. UNDRO is appealing to donors for United States $300 million immediately.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced on 5 April, the United Kingdom will be contributing up to £20 million to the appeals by the United Nations and other humanitarian agencies.

Bombs

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has for new international protocols on the use of fuel air explosive weapons and daisy cutter bombs in warfare.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest estimate of humanitarian assistance given to Kuwaitis and Iraqis.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development gave the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) on 19 April.

I understand that since the launch of their appeals, the international donor community has given at least US$86 million to the UNDRO/UNHCR appeals and at least £33 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross appeal. I am not able to provide complete information on the many other humanitarian agencies and NGOs who are providing assistance to the Kuwaitis and Iraqis either financially or at the practical level.

Incendiary Weapons

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to ratify the United Nations weaponry convention; and what is his policy towards accepting the optional protocol No. III, on the use of incendiary weapons in certain circumstances.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are still considering ratification of the UN weaponry convention. When we have reached a decision, we shall make clear our policy towards protocol No. III.

Kuwait

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what evidence Her Majesty's ambassador in Kuwait has concerning the allegations about the carrying out of reprisals against Palestinians in Kuwait.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A number of Palestinians have approached Her Majesty's embassy in Kuwait about relatives who had been detained. The embassy is also in touch with international humanitarian agencies and human rights organisations monitoring the position of vulnerable groups.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 15 April, Official Report, columns 106-7, to the hon. Member for Linlithgow, what response he has had to his repeated expressions of concern about ill-treatment of Palestinians in Kuwait.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Crown Prince of Kuwait has assured my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that Palestinians will be dealt with in accordance with the law.

German Reunification

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much the reunification of Germany has cost the EC budget.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The gross additional cost on the EC budget during 1991 as a result of German unification will be about 1,915 mecu. That will be partly offset by higher German contributions which will total 1,230 mecu, making the net additional cost some 685 mecu.

PRIME MINISTER

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list by Government Department those subject areas that were previously open to answer via parliamentary questions, but which since June 1979 have been excluded as a consequence of legislation and changes in administrative arrangements.

The Prime Minister: Legislation and changes in administrative arrangements do not generally change the accountability of Ministers to Parliament except where the Government's successful programme of privatisation has removed a particular function from the public sector. In respect of "next steps" agencies, ministerial accountability is unchanged and parliamentary questions relating to executive agencies remain in order, although Ministers may arrange for chief executives to write to Members on matters which have been delegated to an agency in its framework document. I would encourage members to approach chief executives direct in the first instance on such matters, their aim is to provide a response which is as full and as helpful as possible on a timescale similar to that for a ministerial response to a parliamentary question.

HOME DEPARTMENT

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what facilities he has made available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No request for assistance with this appeal has, to my knowledge, been received, but arrangements could be made to draw it to the attention of Home Office staff.

Emergency Planning College

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost of running the Emergency Planning college in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. John Patten: Expenditure on the Emergency Planning college was not separately identified in the Appropriation Accounts prior to 1984 and details could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. For 1984-85 onwards the information requested is as follows:

1984-85	1,058,000
1985-86	1,159,000
1986-87	1,516,000
1987-88	1,368,000
1988-89	1,468,000
1989-90	1,685,000
1990-91[1]	1,517,000

[1] Estimated.

In addition, £226,000 and £670,000 were spent in 1989-90 and 1990-91 respectively on various capital projects in relation to the college buildings.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when was the last independent evaluation of the Emergency Planning college; and when the next such inquiry will take place.

Mr. John Patten: A study was carried out by management consultants between March 1990 and January this year into the ways in which the Emergency Planning college might best discharge its wider remit to address questions of peacetime emergency planning, irrespective of any wartime connections, which was announced by the then Home Secretary in June 1989. There are no plans at present for any further external reviews.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department to whom the management of the Emergency Planning college is accountable.

Mr. John Patten: The Emergency Planning college is part of my right hon. Friend's fire and emergency planning department and, as such is accountable through the normal management structure to him.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what increase has taken place in the staff of the Emergency Planning college since the expansion of its title and role.

Mr. John Patten: Since June 1989 when the Emergency Planning college's change of name and expansion of its role were announced an increase in staff amounting to 2·5 additional posts has been approved. These have not yet been filled. In addition, two posts on the college's original complement have been regraded at a higher level.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what has been the percentage of crimes in the London borough of Wandsworth that have not been cleared up in each of the last five years;

(2) how many sexual offences were reported in the London borough of Wandsworth in each of the last three years;

(3) how many burglary offences were recorded as committed in the London borough of Wandsworth in each of the last three years;

(4) how many crimes were recorded in the London borough of Wandsworth in each of the last three years;

(5) how many cases of physical assault against a person were reported in the London borough of Wandsworth in each of the last three years.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information is contained in the Metropolitan police district annual borough tables, copies of which are available in the Library.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many car thefts were reported in the London borough of Wandsworth in each of the last three years.

Mr. John Patten: The available information is for all thefts and is placed in the Library quarterly. Separate information for car thefts is not available centrally.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the percentage of increase or decrease in crimes in the London borough of Wandsworth in each of the last five years.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is given in the table. Tables giving numbers of offences recorded by the police in each borough of the Metropolitan police district are placed in the Library quarterly.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police in the borough of Wandsworth

Year	Number of offences	Percentage change from previous year
1986	28,030	−2
1987	27,423	−2
1988	25,308	−8
1989	27,955	+10
1990	32,679	+17

Policing Costs

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list those sporting activities which are required to pay for policing costs;

(2) if he will make it his policy for fox-hunts to pay for the costs of policing their activities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Police functions are carried out at public expense under the Police Act 1964; where special policy services—outside their normal functions—are provided, a charge may be made under section 15 of the Act, but this is at the discretion of the police authority concerned. Eligibility for charging depends on the nature of the police function, not the sport or other activity concerned.

Mauritius

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people from the island of Mauritius have been deported from the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of Mauritian citizens removed from the United Kingdom in each year since 1986 under the deportation process is as follows:

Year	Number
1986	14
1987	6
1988	6
1989	12
1990	8

Stockton Borough Council

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations have been made to him by Stockton borough council concerning the extension of a ban on drinking in public places to Yarm and Thornaby.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In March, Stockton-on-Tees borough council applied to renew its existing byelaws for prohibiting the consumption of intoxicating liquor in the same areas which were designated during the two-year experimental period. Officials wrote to the council on 26 March, giving provisional approval to the byelaws. We have not received any proposals to extend the byelaws to additional areas, but we understand that the council is considering making such an application at a later date.

Prison Education Budgets

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on why the budgets for education in prison establishments for 1991-92 were not allocated on a full-year basis; and what plans are being made for the future budgeting of education, establishment by establishment.

Mrs. Rumbold: Following the reorganisation of the prison service, prison establishments were advised in February of an interim allocation of funds for education purposes to cover their first quarter's expenditure in 1991-92. This was to enable the new area managers to obtain further specialist advice to ensure that full year's budgets, to be notified to establishments in June, make the most effective use of overall educational provision for the prison service. In future, area managers will be involved at an earlier stage in the budget-setting process and the agreed overall provision will be allocated between establishments by area managers at the beginning of the financial year, following consultation with governors and the relevant specialists.

Prison Education

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on the future of the financing of education in prison establishments currently funded through local education authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I would refer my hon. Friend to the statement made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science on 21 March at columns 432-34. Future arrangements for the funding of education in prison establishments will be determined in the light of the Government plans for the reorganisation of further education as a whole, on which a White Paper is to be published shortly.

Kurds

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to make special provision to grant Kurds political asylum in United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We do not consider that the large-scale resettlement of Iraqi Kurds in Western countries is an answer to the current problem. All asylum applications made in the United Kingdom are considered in accordance with the United Nations convention on refugees.

Lewes Prison

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the maximum security alert at Lewes prison on 27 March; and if he will list for the last 12 months the number of times Lewes prison has been put on maximum security alert; and for what reasons.

Mrs. Rumbold: Following the discovery of live ammunition at Lewes prison, the governor made arrangements for a full scale search of the prison buildings and grounds. This search took place on 26 and 27 March. Investigations are in progress. There were full alerts called to carry out extensive searching at Lewes on the following occasions during the last 12 months: 22 November 1990; 2 to 6 December 1990.

Royal Prerogative of Mercy

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list separately for each year from 1980 to 1990 the number of cases in which the royal prerogative of mercy was exercised to grant (a) a free pardon, (b) a remission of imprisonment, (c) remission of Borstal training, youth custody and detention in a young offenders' institution, (d) remission of detention and (e) remission of fine, on grounds affecting the original conviction, in cases other than those involving road traffic offences.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 18 April 1991]: The information requested is as follows:

Year	(a) Free Pardons	(b) Remission of imprisonment	(c) Remission of Borstal training, Youth custody, detention in a Young Offender Institution	(d) Remission of detention	(e) Remission of fine

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Nigeria and Ghana

41. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance in commerce and in education is being provided for Nigeria and Ghana.

Mrs. Chalker: Assistance to education in Nigeria in 1990-91 covered nine separate projects at a total cost last year of some £1·37 million. There is no aid currently specifically to commerce. In Ghana total education costs amounted to about £0·9 million in 1990-91, including training in Britain. In commerce, a United Kingdom training award is available in 1991 to the Ghana Export Promotion Council. These figures do not include our wide-ranging programmes of United Kingdom training in other sectors amounting to a further £2·5 million for Nigeria and £1·4 million for Ghana. Both countries have better developed education systems than many others in Africa.

Famine, Africa

42. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance his Department is currently giving to relieve famine in Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We have committed £152 million in emergency assistance to Africa since the beginning of 1989. On 15 April, I announced a new pledge of assistance worth £33 million. Most of this will go to the Horn of Africa, where the famine is most acute. It will be in addition to the £33 million we have already provided to the region since last September.

The Gulf

43. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what financial assistance the Government are providing for Jordan and other neighbouring states affected by the Gulf war.

Mrs. Chalker: As our share of the EC special allocation to countries affected by the Gulf crisis we are providing £20 million to Jordan, £23 million each to Egypt and Turkey, £8 million to the occupied territories and £21 million to Israel. Since the invasion of Kuwait the United Kingdom has provided £18·65 million in humanitarian assistance through bilateral and EC channels. In addition we have committed £21·7 million to alleviate the plight of the Iraqi refugees. In the current financial year we expect our normal bilateral assistance to amount to £5·25 million for Jordan, £11 million for Egypt, £5 million for Turkey and some £1·5 million for the occupied territories.

Alternative Crops

44. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what approaches have been made to the Overseas Development Administration in respect of alternative commercial crops in Commonwealth countries whose economies rely significantly on the export of sugar and bananas, respectively.

Mrs. Chalker: We are helping the eastern Caribbean countries—Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia and St. Vincent —whose economies rely heavily on banana exports, with a number of agricultural diversification projects.

Environment Conference, Brazil

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what financial support will be made available by Her Majesty's Government to (a) delegations from less-developed nations and (b) non-governmental organisations based in the United Kingdom, to assist their attendance at the United Nations conference on environment and development, to be held in Rio De Janeiro in June 1992.

Mrs. Chalker: We have offered £32,000 to the voluntary fund established to help finance participation by developing countries in the conference and its preparatory process. The United Nations General Assembly has not yet decided on the participation of non-governmental organisations in the conference.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Victoria Tower

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Lord President of the Council what is his most recent estimate of the cost of the scaffolding erected at the Victoria Tower.

Mr. MacGregor: £1·5 million.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Building Societies

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) the building societies which will not be repaid and (b) the amounts of tax involved, under the proposals referred to in paragraph 4.22 of the 1991 Financial Statement.

Mr. Maude: It would not be appropriate to provide information about the tax affairs of individual taxpayers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) to what extent the view of Inland Revenue that the disputed extra tax paid by building societies does not in fact involve the payment of extra tax, is based on the ground that building societies account on an accruals basis while government accounts on a cash basis;

(2) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Eltham of 15 April Official Report, columns 9-11, about the way building societies account for tax, whether his answer was based on the premise that the Inland Revenue would not receive extra tax or that building societies would not pay extra tax.

Mr. Maude: The 1986 change from the old basis on which building societies accounted for tax annually on interest accruing in their accounting year to the present system under which they account quarterly for tax on interest and dividends paid does not mean societies have paid extra tax. The change affected the time of payments, not their amounts. Interest and dividends paid during transitional periods have been subjected to a single charge to tax.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the occasions on which the Government publicly acknowledged the effect that a judgment adverse to the Inland Revenue in the Woolwich Equitable building society case might have on other building societies; and what the likely effect was judged to be on each such occasion.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to this matter in this year's Budget statement. There has been no previous occasion of a similar Government statement on this matter.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give details of where the £250 million for 1986 transitional provisions: building societies, shown in table 4.1 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" 1991-92, comes from.

Mr. Maude: The figure is the estimated amount, net of corporation tax, which will not be repaid to various building societies following my right hon. Friend's Budget proposal contained in clause 50 of the Finance Bill.

Separate Taxation

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is a requirement for the tax affairs of a wife and a husband to be dealt with by separate tax offices when one does not earn money outside the home.

Mr. Maude: The tax offices dealing with the tax affairs of a wife and a husband are, following the introduction of independent taxation, determined separately by reference to the nature of their respective incomes.

Interest Rates

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on reduced interest rates in European Community countries which discriminate in favour of (a) small businesses and (b) farming businesses; whether such arrangements will be permitted in the single European market; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: Information on state aids in the Community, including in the small firms and agricultural sectors, is published in the European Commission's reviews of state aids in the Community. All state aid schemes are notifiable by member states to the Commission; the Commission then decides whether they are compatible with the treaty of Rome.

Judicial Review

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many times in the last three years the Inland Revenue has experienced judicial review; how often it lost; and how often building society tax was involved;

(2) whether he has decided that all future potential gainers from judicial reviews of Inland Revenue decisions must make their own applications concurrently.

Mr. Maude: There have been 15 applications for judicial review involving the Inland Revenue in the last three years, of which four have been granted. Only one application involved building society interest. It is for individual taxpayers to decide whether or not to apply for judicial review of an Inland Revenue decision.

Foundation for Sport and the Arts

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the £40 million to be collected by the Pools Promoters Association for the proposed Foundation for Sport and the Arts will be taken from the total money now allocated to the payment of prizes.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: This is a matter for the pools promoters, but I understand that the proposal is that a proportion of the total remittance submitted by clients will be held in trust for the foundation.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the European Community total gross domestic product was, at the latest available date, accounted for by (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France, (c) Germany and (d) Italy.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Data for GDP in the European Community are published by the OECD in "Main Economic Indicators".

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of gross domestic product was accounted for by interest expenses in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany, respectively, in the last three years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Data for interest payments for these countries are not available. Data for receipts and payments of investment income are published by the IMF in "Balance of Payments Statistics Yearbook".

Value Added Tax

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the rates of value added tax charged in (a) France and (b) Germany.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The value added tax rates charged are:

	France Per cent.	Germany Per cent.
Standard	18·6	14·0
Increased	22·0	—
Reduced	2·1, 5·5	7·0

Earnings

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many full-time, part-time, male and female workers earn below the PAYE threshold in the northern region and in each of the counties within the region.

Mr. Maude: The information requested is not available.

Services Sector

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the total amount of the wages and salaries of the economies of (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany is accounted for by the wages and salaries of the services sector, respectively, in the latest available year.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest available figures for these countries analysed by industry of employment are shown under the heading "Compensation of employees" in the annual OECD publication "National Accounts Detailed Tables Volume II (1976-1988)" of which copies are available in the Library of the House—see pages (a) 534 (b) 232 (c) 259.

DEFENCE

Aldermaston and Burghfield Housing

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what refurbishments and repairs are being carried out to Ministry of Defence houses at the AWE, Aldermaston and Burghfield common estate; and when he anticipates these houses to be up to the standards set down for council and housing association properties.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The current ongoing maintenance programme at AWE Aldermaston and Burghfield covers both refurbishment and repair. The cost of maintaining the stock of the 775 civilian houses and flats at these locations will be £1,400,000 in the financial year 1991-92.

On the matter of standards, the Ministry of Defence is not a housing authority and not in consequence bound by the standards of the authorities referred to. Housing is provided at AWE for both essential Ministry of Defence police staff and to facilitate recruitment and retention of other staff. The houses are all maintained to an acceptable standard.

Main Battle Tanks

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many new main battle tanks he will be ordering to replace Chieftain tanks.

Mr. Alan Clark: No decision on numbers of equipment for our future main battle tank fleet has yet been taken.

MV Antares

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he received the draft report on the sinking of the Antares; for what reasons he has not yet been able to publish the findings; when he expects to publish the report or its findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The report of the Royal Navy board of inquiry is being considered as a matter of priority. However, the report is very comprehensive and we have an obligation to all those concerned to ensure that the full legal and other implications of its findings are thoroughly studied. A summary of the findings will be released as soon as this process has been completed.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Clothing Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he intends to take to assist the clothing manufacturing industry in the Easington constituency during the present recession.

Mr. Leigh: There are no plans to introduce assistance measures for the clothing manufacturing industry in the Easington constituency. Firms in the constituency are eligible for assistance under the regional selective assistance scheme as well as the Department's R and D and enterprise initiative consultancy measures.

Trade Descriptions Act

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will bring forward proposals to implement the recommendation of the Office of Fair Trading concerning bringing under the Trade Descriptions Act the claims made in letters from timeshare companies.

Mr. Leigh: The amendments to the Trade Descriptions Act proposed as a result of the current review, including those arising from the Director General of Fair Trading's report on timeshare will be implemented as soon as parliamentary time is available.

Tootal Group

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the Office of Fair Trading is considering the practice of companies capitalising pension fund surpluses in order to establish a higher rating or obtain higher funding on its consideration of the takeover bid for the Tootal Group plc; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: In reaching his decision on whether to refer the proposed acquisition by Coats Viyella of Tootal Group to the MMC my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will take into consideration the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. The director general's advice takes all relevant issues into account.

Iraq

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he was asked to approve British entries on the list of specially designated nationals of Iraq issued by the United States Government on 1 April.

Mr. Sainsbury: No.

Chlorofluorocarbons

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in what ways he has monitored and encouraged the progress of the refrigeration industry to move away from CFCs; and what study he has made of acoustic refrigeration.

Mr. Leigh: My Department regularly meets producers and users of chlorofluorocarbons and other ozone-depleting substances to discuss alternative options for when production of these substances is phased out over the next few years. These contacts include the development and use of substitutes in refrigeration. My Department participates in relevant United Kingdom conferences and international fora and last year published through HMSO a study commissioned from independent consultants "CFCs and Halons: Alternatives and the Scope for Recovery for Recycling and Destruction".

The Department offers support to industry for development of environmentally cleaner technologies, for example through the enterprise initiative and the environmental technology innovation scheme, the environmental management options scheme and Euroenviron. It has made no formal study nor received any project proposal relating to acoustic refrigeration. However, I understand that while this technique may be being developed for use in space, the view of the refrigeration industry is that the high engineering standards it requires currently render it economically unviable for more general application.

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the total output of manufactured goods of the EC was, at the latest available date, accounted for by (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France, (c) Germany and (d) Italy.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information is in the table.

EC output[1] of manufacturing[2] products in 1987

	Output (ecus million)	Percentage of total EC output
United Kingdom	135,306	15·3
France	153,449	17·4

Italy	152,287	17·2

[1] Output is defined as gross value added at market prices.
[2] NACE classification—section 3.
[3] Federal Republic of Germany as in 1987.

Environment Conferences

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department was represented at the expert seminar on packaging and the environment held in Sweden on 7 to 8 February.

Mr. Leigh: Yes, my Department was represented and presented a paper to the seminar which was arranged in the framework of the United Nations Environment Programme/International Energy Office cleaner production programme.

Clean Production Technologies

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether Her Majesty's Government will undertake a collaborative initiative with the Industry and Environment Office of the United Nations environment programme on clean technologies for production.

Mr. Leigh: Her Majesty's Government are already participating in the United Nations Environment Programme/International Energy Office's cleaner production programme. In September 1990, the Government hosted a United Nations Environment Programme seminar at Canterbury on the subject of "Cleaner Production". The seminar was opened by my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment; officials both from my Department and the Department of the Environment also participated.

Foundries

Mr. Crowther: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what complaints he has received since the beginning of 1990 about state subsidies to companies in the foundry industry in other European Community countries and in Japan; and what action has been taken in connection therewith.

Mr. Sainsbury: One complaint has been received from a British company about alleged state subsidies to the iron foundry industries in France, Italy and Spain. My Department raised the matter with the European Commission which is responsible for monitoring state aids in the Community. I understand the Commission is pursuing the matter and is in contact with the company concerned.

Cornish Tin Mining

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department had any discussions with Carnon Holdings about the effect of the withdrawal of his Department's funds for tin mining on the holding of a 90-day consultation period between the company and the work force employed in the tin mines.

Mr. Leigh: The content of the numerous discussions with Carnon Holdings Limited is confidential. The terms and conditions of employment in Carnon, including redundancy payments and pension rights, are a matter for the company.

Petroleum Coke

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many complaints he has received about the use of petroleum coke in domestic fireplaces; whether the sulphur emissions of this fuel conform to the recommended levels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 18 April 1991]: My Department has received representations from 13 organisations seeking controls on the supply of petroleum coke for domestic use. We have received very few complaints from users of this fuel.

The maximum sulphur content of fuels authorised for use in smoke control areas is 2 per cent. I understand that some varieties of petroleum coke have a higher sulphur content.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Evening Standard

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will obtain for his Department's library a copy of the Evening Standard "London Life" article by Keith Dovkants and Bruce Kemble of 16 April.

Mr. Eggar: The Department regularly purchases the Evening Standard, including the edition referred to. Relevant articles are placed in the Library.

Special Education

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list for each of the years from 1984 to 1990 the number of special classes or units in (a) primary schools in each local education authority and express this as a proportion of all primary schools in the local education authority and (b) secondary schools in each local education authority and express this as a proportion of all secondary schools in the local education authority;

(2) if he will list for each of the years from 1984 to 1990 the number of pupils with statements on the register of special classes in each local education authority (a) spending at least 70 per cent. of their time there and (b) spending less than 70 per cent. of their time in special classes, and express these figures as percentages of children registered in special classes in the local education authority;

(3) if he will detail for each year from 1984 to 1990 the number of children in each local education authority in England newly receiving special educational provision under a statement in ordinary schools and express this (a) as a percentage of all new statements made by the local education authority in that year and (b) as a percentage of all current statements maintained by the local education authority;

(4) if he will detail for each of the years from 1984 to 1990 the number of children under the age of five years with a statement of special educational need in each local education authority in England and express this as a percentage of all children of pre-school age in the local education authority;

(5) if he will detail for each local education authority in England the number of pupils with statements of special educational need recorded as attending maintained and non-maintained special schools and express this (a) as a percentage of all school children in the local education authority and (b) as a percentage of children with a statement in the local education authority, for each of the years from 1983 to 1989;

(6) if he will list for each year from 1984 to 1990 the number of children with statements of special educational needs newly placed in special or independent schools by each local education authority in England and express this as a proportion of the total number of new statements made by each local education authority;

(7) if he will list for each year from 1984 to 1990 the number of children in each local education authority in England transferred from special schools to mainstream schools and express this (a) as a proportion of the special school population in each local education authority and (b) as a proportion of children with statements in the local education authority;

(8) if he will detail for each of the years from 1984 to 1990 the number of children with statements on the register of ordinary classes in each local education authority in England and express this (a) as a percentage of all children with statements in the local education authority and (b) as a percentage of all pupils in the local education authority;

(9) if he will list for each year from 1984 to 1990 the number of children in each local education authority in England awaiting the provision specified in their statement and express this (a) as a percentage of all new statements made in that year by the local education authority and (b) as a percentage of all statements maintained by the local education authority.

Mr. Fallon: This information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

School Heads

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy on the appointment of school heads without the use of inspectors' reports.

Mr. Eggar: The selection of head teachers is a matter for local education authorities and governing bodies in schools without delegated budgets, and for governing bodies, after considering any advice from the chief education officer, in schools with delegated budgets. In reaching decisions the Government would expect LEAs and schools to take account of all relevant considerations.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report pupil-teacher ratios for primary and secondary schools in England and Wales.

Mr. Fallon: The pupil-teacher ratios within maintained primary and secondary schools in England in January 1990 were 22·0 and 15·3 respectively. Similar information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Adult Education

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list figures for (a) recurrent and (b) capital spending by the Government on adult education for each year since 1978-79 in (i) cash terms and (ii) real terms indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100.

Mr. Eggar: Central Government expenditure in respect of adult education bodies, REPLAN and PICKUP, is given in the tables. It is not possible to express expenditure in real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100. Instead the figures are given in cash terms and at 1978-79 prices.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what number of higher education academic and non-academic staff have (a) taken early retirement and (b) accepted redundancy in each year since 1978-79; and what was the total cost to the Government for higher education academic and non-academic staff taking early retirement or accepting redundancy for each year since 1978-79 in (i) cash terms and (ii) real terms indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Available information for universities is shown in the table. This relates to claims met by the University Grants Committee and the Universities Funding Council for reimbursement of premature retirement and redundancy compensation since 1978-79. Information is not collected centrally about premature retirements and redundancies funded from universities' own resources.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list figures for the average salary of full-time lecturers at (a) universities, (b) polytechnics and (c) colleges of higher education for each year since 1978-79 in (i) cash terms and (ii) real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100;

(2) if he will list figures for the average rise in salary of full-time lecturers at (a) universities, (b) polytechnics and (c) colleges of adult and continuing education for each year since 1978-79 in (i) absolute cash terms, (ii) real terms and (iii) in terms of the rise in average earnings indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100;

(3) what was the cost of salaries to (a) academic staff and (b) non-academic staff at (1) universities, (2) polytechnics and (3) colleges of higher education each year since 1978-79 in (i) cash terms and (ii) real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100;

(4) if he will list figures for the average rise in salary of full-time lecturers at (a) universities, (b) polytechnics and (c) colleges of higher education for each year since 1978-79 in relation to the rise in average professional earnings.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information is not available in the form requested, but the following tables should be useful. In each case, the real-terms series for average salaries are derived on the basis of movements in all items RPI, and those for salary bills on the basis of movements in the GDP deflator. The figures for academic staff pay shown do not include any non-salary earnings: comparable information is not available on such earnings. The university figures relate to Great Britain and those for local authority maintained institutions to England and Wales.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Information is contained in the Department's statistical publications.

Data on mature students are given in Statistical Bulletin 2/91—"Mature Students in Higher Education". Numbers of academic staff are shown in table 9 of "Education Statistics for the United Kingdom"; details of non-academic staff are not available centrally. Statistical Bulletin 11/90—"Student Numbers in Higher Education" contains details of full and part-time students, by sector, level of study, age and sex. Statistical Bulletin 11/89—"Students from Abroad in Great Britain" and table 30 of "Education Statistics for the United Kingdom" give details of students from abroad, by country and sector.

All those publications are available in the Library.

The total numbers of young home initial entrants in full-time higher education expressed as a percentage of the averaged 18 to 19-year-old Great Britain population—the Age Participation Index (API)—were:

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been spent on discretionary awards to higher education students in each year since 1978-79 in (a) cash terms and (b) real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The table shows expenditure on discretionary awards made by local education authorities in England and Wales using their powers under section 1(6) of the Education Act 1962.

Academic Year	Cash expenditure £ million	At 1978-79 Prices £ million	Index
1978-79	8·3	8·3	100

1982-83	9·3	5·8	70
1983-84	9·9	5·8	70
1984-85	10·1	5·7	69

1987-88	12·7	6·3	76
1988-89	11·4	5·3	64

Awards made under section 1(6) are made at LEA's discretion to students attending courses designated for mandatory awards purposes who are personally ineligible for a mandatory award. The cash expenditure includes both fees and maintenance paid as part of the award. The constant price and index figures have been calculated using the retail price index. The reduction in expenditure in 1982-83 reflected a change in the level of fees payable as part of the award.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list figures for (a) recurrent spending and (b) capital spending by the Government on (1) universities and (2) polytechnics and colleges of higher education for each year since 1978-79 in (i) cash terms and (ii) real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Data from 1985-86 to 1990-91 are available from the departmental report (CM1511) available in the House Library. Grants distributed on the advice of the Universities Grants Committee (UGC) for 1978-79 through to 1988-89 are given in the table along with central Government expenditure on other higher education.

Included under other higher education are those voluntary and direct grant colleges that became the responsibility of the PCFC from 1989-90, the Open university, Cranfield Institute of Technology, the Royal College of Art, British Academy postgraduate state studentships and other higher education grants.

Libraries

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list figures for (a) recurrent and (b) capital spending by the Government on (i) university libraries and (ii) polytechnic libraries and colleges of further education libraries, for each year since 1978-79 in (1) cash terms and (2) real terms indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth: There is no earmarked public funding for book provision through either the higher education funding councils or specific grants for further education. It is for individual institutions to determine their expenditure within the total resources at their disposal.

Student Grants

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the cost of increasing the level of student grants by (a) 1 per cent., (b) 5 per cent. and (c) 10 per cent.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I have already announced the intention for 1991-92 to hold the main rates of grant payable under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations steady in cash terms at their current values. Increases in student support are now provided primarily by increases in the student loan facility. Total full-year support from grant and loan combined in the current academic year is 25 per cent. higher than grant alone last year.

The cost in the 1992-93 financial year of raising the main rates of grant, assuming that parental contributions would continue to be held steady in cash terms, would be as follows:

raise by 1 per cent.—£13 million
raise by 5 per cent.—£58 million
raise by 10 per cent.—£116 million.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of students have been assessed for the maximum parental contribution student maintenance grant; and what proportion of students in receipt of awards have received the maximum grant in each year since 1978-79.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Data are not available in the form requested. The maximum parental contribution was introduced for the 1985-86 academic year and applies in aggregate if the parent has more than one child who holds an award. The maximum parental contribution has been set as follows:

1985-86	4,000
1986-87	4,300
1987-88	4,600
1988-89	4,900
1989-90	5,300
1990-91	5,800

The maximum parental contribution will be held steady in cash terms for 1991-92 in line with our new arrangements for student support.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average parental contribution of those assessed for a contribution for each year since 1978-79 in (i) cash terms and (ii) real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth: It is not possible to give the average parental contribution only for those parents assessed as being liable for a contribution. The table shows the average parental contribution assessed under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations for all award holders, including those whose contribution was assessed at nil.

Academic year	Contribution cash (£)	At 1978-79 prices £	Index

1988-89	860	403	146

The constant price and index figures have been calculated using the retail prices index.

Postgraduate Awards

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the level of postgraduate awards for each year since 1978-79 in (a) cash terms and (b) real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The levels of postgraduate awards, as at October each year, since 1978-79 in cash and real terms are given in the table:

Open University

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the Government have spent in grants for (a) current expenditure and (b) capital expenditure to the Open university in each year since 1978-79 in (a) cash terms and (b) real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The tables give recurrent and capital grants to the Open university since 1978-79 in cash terms and also expressed as an index[1] using 100 as a base for the financial year 1978-79. The figures for capital grant reflect a decline in the number of capital projects after the initial development of the Walton Hall site.

Higher Education

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was total Government spending on higher education student support in each year since 1978-79 in (a) cash terms and (b) real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100; and what was expenditure per student over the same period.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The table shows the expenditure made by local education authorities in England and Wales in bestowing mandatory awards under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations:

Academic Year	Expenditure Cash £ million	At 1978-79 Prices £ million	Index	Expenditure per student cash £
1978-79	468·9	468·9	100	1,466
1979-80	550·0	472·1	101	1,705
1980-81	679·3	503·0	107	2,031
1981-82	783·4	520·9	111	2,210
1982-83	680·6	421·9	90	1,837
1983-84	719·1	424·0	90	1,870
1984-85	706·6	397·9	85	1,788

1987-88	765·4	379·3	81	1,893
1988-89	825·7	386·4	82	1,988

The cash expenditure includes both fees and maintenance paid as part of the mandatory award. The constant price and index figures have been calculated using the retail prices index. The reduction in expenditure per student in 1982-83 reflected a change in the level of fees payable as part of the mandatory award.

Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the Government have allocated to the National Advisory Body, and subsequently for the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council, each year since 1982 in (i) cash terms and (ii) real terms, indexed so that 1982 equals 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth: With the creation of the PCFC sector in 1989-90, direct comparisons with earlier years are not possible. Funds allocated to the PCFC amounted to £1,114 million in 1989-90 and an estimated £1,108 million in 1990-91.

Prior to 1989-90, funding of colleges now in the PCFC sector was not directly through NAB. Figures from 1982-83 through to 1988-89 therefore cover not only those institutions currently in the PCFC sector but the other higher education establishments maintained by the local authority sector. Total allocations to these establishments for higher education plus capital expenditure by LEAs amounted to:

	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89
Cash figures (£ million)	614	634	657	703	748	810	887

Oxford Polytechnic

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the subject areas at Oxford polytechnic for which Her Majesty's inspectors were not able to give advise on the quality of provision to the programme advisory groups of the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council when they were considering bids for 1991-92.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Oxford polytechnic claimed outstanding quality in eight of the nine Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council programme areas as part of its bid for funds in 1991-92. Her Majesty's inspectorate had sufficient recent inspection evidence to offer advice to the appropriate PCFC programme advisory group on the majority of these claims. The exceptions were some aspects of programme area 2 (built environment) and programme area 9b (in-service education).

Correspondence

Mr. Mudd : To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne may expect a reply to his letter of 18 January regarding a funding matter concerning the Falmouth school of art and design.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I wrote to my right hon. Friend on 19 April.

Haberdashers' Aske's Schools

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many applicants and how many acceptances there were for places for the Haberdashers' Aske's Hatcham Wood boys and girls schools for the years beginning September 1990 and September 1989, respectively; and what is the ethnic breakdown of these figures for boys and girls, respectively.

Mr. Eggar: The recorded intake for the boys' and girls' schools were, for the boys, 96 and 99 and, for the girls, 96 and 97 in 1989 and 1990 respectively. Intake statistics by ethnic background are not held centrally for these years. However, I understand that the girls' school has produced such statistics for its own purposes for 1990.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford, Official Report, 28 March, columns 485-86, if he will give the ethnic breakdown for applications and acceptances by the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology colleges for the year beginning September 1991 for boys and girls, respectively.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to her on 28 March, Official Report, columns 485-86. It is not possible to identify the sex of all initial applicants (830); of those interviewed 302 were boys and 265 girls.

Global Youth Summit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department will make available resources to assist the attendance of British young environmentalists at the Global Youth Summit planned to be held in Rio De Janeiro from 2 to 8 June 1992.

Mr. Atkins: The Department has no plans to do so.

Cambridge Regional College

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he proposes that the existing sites on which Cambridge regional college is located, to be vacated on completion of the college capital project, should be transferred back to the local education authority or whether they should be regarded as the property of the college.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend made clear in his statement to the House on 21 March, Official Report, columns. 432-48, that he intends to vest colleges with the land, buildings and plants which they currently use. The disposal of such assets will require his specific consent. Each case will be considered on its merits and he will listen to any reasonable proposals that LEAs wish to make. My right hon. and learned Friend looks forward to receiving details of Cambridgeshire LEA's proposals for the transfer of assets currently used by Cambridge regional college.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will provide the necessary assurances to enable tendering to be completed and work to begin as scheduled on the capital project to provide new purpose-built accommodation for the Cambridge regional college;

(2) what evaluation he has made of the effects of his statement on the future of further education on the tendering process for phase one of the capital project to provide new accommodation for Cambridge regional college.

Mr. Eggar: LEAs are required to gain the consent of college governing bodies for all contracts that endure beyond 31 March 1993 and will, additionally, require the Secretary of State's consent for contracts valued in excess of £50,000. My right hon. and learned Friend intends that these requirements should not unnecessarily impede the tendering process. He looks forward to receiving details of Cambridgeshire LEA's contract proposals for phase 1 of the regional college's building project.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to provide a guarantee that the debt charges on capital expenditure to provide new accommodation for Cambridge regional college will not remain the responsibility of the local education authority should the college be accorded corporate status.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend is considering the treatment of debt charges arising after 31 March 1993 from capital spending on colleges and will announce his intentions shortly.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from Cambridgeshire county council about the impact of his statement on the future of further education on the project for new purpose-built accommodation for the Cambridge regional college.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has received a representation about the impact of his statement on Cambridge regional college about debt charges and capital funding after 31 March 1993 for the building project at Cambridge regional college. Officers of the authority have also been in touch with DES officials.

Environmental Research Database

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the role of the global environmental research office and database established at the Science and Engineering Research Council headquarters in Swindon.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The United Kingdom global environmental research office, which is jointly funded by the five research councils and housed by the Natural Environment Research Council in Swindon, acts as a focal point for the provision and dissemination of information on United Kingdom and international GER science and policy developments, and as a contact point for equivalent offices in other countries. It provides the secretariat for the United Kingdom inter-agency committee on global environment change and maintains a database of United Kingdom GER research activities.

Female Circumcision

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide guidance for teachers on female circumcision and the symptoms of children at risk and recent victims.

Mr. Fallon: Where teachers are concerned about the health and welfare of pupils, they should make their concerns known to the relevant agencies under the arrangements for inter-agency co-operation for the protection of children. There is existing central guidance on these arrangements, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is planning to issue revised guidance later this year, which will draw attention to the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985.

Schools (Local Management)

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will announce his plans for further delegation and increased independence for schools under schemes of local management; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: Today we are publishing departmental circular 7/91, which sets out new guidance for local education authorities on the local management of schools. The measures contained in the circular reflect our determination to ensure that schools become more independent of their LEAs.

Local management of schools will be extended as follows:

any school may apply for delegated management from April 1992;

all schools must have delegated management by April 1994;

by April 1993, 85 per cent. of the potential schools budget must be delegated to the school level which, on 1990-91 figures, will release a further £140 million to our schools;

by April 1993, 80 per cent. of those delegated funds must be linked directly to pupil numbers, weighted for age and special needs;

special schools will be able to apply for delegated management from April 1994, by which time local authorities must have introduced formula funding for all special schools.

To ensure that schools have the necessary flexibility efficiently to manage their budgets, we intend to require local education authorities to allow all secondary schools to operate their own bank accounts.

Copies of the circular are today being placed in the Library of the House.

WALES

Prehistoric Sites

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he intends any initiatives to vary the extent of excavations on prehistoric sites in Gwent and Glamorgan.

Mr. David Hunt: No. The extent of archaeological excavations funded by my Department and the particular approach for specific sites is kept under constant review. This ensures the most effective archaeological response to threatened sites.

Nursery Schools

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of local authority nursery school places provided by every Welsh education authority, expressed as a percentage of the eligible children in each area.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The proportion of three and four-year-olds in nursery schools in September 1990 is shown in the following table. Data on the number of places in nursery schools are not held centrally.

Percentage of 3 and 4 year old population[1]

	Per cent.
Clwyd	1·4
Dyfed	2·5
Gwent	8·8
Mid Glamorgan	7·4
South Glamorgan	6·9
West Glamorgan	2·3

[1] There are no nursery schools in Gwynedd or Powys, although, as in all counties, a significant number of other 3 and 4-year-olds attend schools either in nursery classes or in ordinary classes.

New House Building

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total of new house and flat construction by Welsh local authorities in each of the past 12 years.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Annual data from 1975 to 1989 was published in table 2·3 of Welsh Housing Statistics No. 10, 1990, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. In 1990, 551 dwellings were completed by local authorities.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the percentage of total unemployment in (a) the area covered by the valleys initiative and (b) Wales during each of the past 24 months for which details are available.

Mr. David Hunt: Unemployment rates for Wales and the valleys area are given in the following table:

Unemployment rate percentage

	Wales	Programme for the valleys area
1989
April	7·9	11·3
May	7·5	10·8

1991
January	7·8	10·7
February	8·1	11·0
March	8·3	11·5

Note:
The rates are calculated by expressing the unadjusted number of unemployed claimants as a percentage of the estimated total work force (the sum of unemployed claimants, employees in employment, self-employed, HM forces and participants on work-related Government training programmes). Mid-year estimates of the relevant total work force are used in calculating the unemployment rates. The Welsh figures for 1989 use 1989 mid-year estimates of the total work force in Wales; the Welsh figures for 1990 and the first three months of 1991 use mid-1990 estimates of the total work force. Unemployment rates calculated for the programme for the valleys area use mid-1989 estimates of the total work force in the area throughout.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Social Security

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the main rate of supplementary benefit or income support available in Northern Ireland in 1979 for (i) a single person and (ii) a couple with two children; and what the value would be today if it had been raised in line with (a) the RPI and (b) average industrial wages.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The available information is as follows:

	Single[1] householder	Couple[1] with two children under 5
Supplementary benefit
Scale rate—November 1979	18·30	40·10
Value if raised in line with:
(a) RPI[2]	37·99	83·26
(b) average earnings[3]	46·86	102·68

The figures are not comparable with any current income support rates; supplementary benefit was structured and assessed in a completely different manner.
[1] Under pension age and unemployed.
[2] To April 1990.
[3] New Series Index (Whole Economy) seasonally adjusted to April 1990.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Local Offices

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are receiving family credit in the areas covered by the Poplar, Stepney and Shoreditch DSS offices, respectively; and how many people in Tower Hamlets as a whole are receiving family credit.

Mr. Jack: The number of families receiving family credit who were living in the areas covered by the local social security offices in Tower Hamlets at the time their award was made is as follows:

	Number
Poplar	568
Stepney	1,156
Shoreditch	282
TOTAL	2,006

Note: Number of awards actually in payment on 8 February 1991 i.e. excludes awards on claims made before that date but not decided at that stage.

Poll Tax Rebates

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many poll tax payers in the Easington district council area will lose rebate arising out of the proposed reduction in the poll tax.

Miss Widdecombe: This information is not available.

Adjudication Regulations

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide a detailed estimate of the annual savings that would be made by the abolition of regulation 72 of the Adjudication Regulations in relation to supplementary benefit and national assistance.

Miss Widdecombe: Estimates of the impact of amending the regulation to exclude supplementary benefit and national assistance are uncertain and no estimate of savings is therefore possible.

Child Benefit

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish figures showing the age distribution of the first children for whom £2 a week extra child benefit will be payable from next October, distinguishing between children aged 0 to 4 years, 5 to 10 years, 11 to 15 years and 16 years or over.

Mr. Jack: The latest available estimates are based on June 1990 figures. They show that the number of children for whom the higher child benefit rate of £9·25 a week will be payable from October 1991 will be:

	Million
Aged 0 to 4 years	1·7
Aged 5 to 10 years	2·0
Aged 11 to 15 years	2·2
Aged 16 years or over	0·9
TOTAL	6·8

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will tabulate figures showing the annual costs of each extra £1 a week child benefit for (a) first children, (b) second children, (c) third children and (d) fourth and subsequent children.

Mr. Jack: We estimate that the costs in 1991-92 would be (a) £355 million, (b) £205 million, (c) £60 million, and (d) £20 million.

If such increases were offset in national insurance and income-related benefits, the net costs would be (a) £250 million, (b) £150 million, (c) £40 million, and (d) £10 million.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the annual cost (a) gross and (b) after deduction of income support of uprating child benefit from its present level (i) by £1 a week for the first child only, (ii) by a further £1 a week for the first child plus 25 pence a week for the second and subsequent children and (iii) by £2·30 a week for each child; and what would be the comparable figures for uprating child benefit from its proposed October 1991 level by an extra 30 pence a week for the first child and an extra £2·05 a week for second and subsequent children.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 28 March 1991]: On the basis of our latest estimates, the gross full year costs in 1991-92 of uprating child benefit from the 1990-91 rate of £7·25 per week would be (i) £355 million, (ii) £425 million, and (iii) £1,475 million.

The equivalent net costs, after the normal adjustments to national insurance and income-related benefits, are (i) £250 million, (ii) £300 million and (iii) £1,045 million.

The full year costs in 1991-92 of increasing child benefit by 30p per week for the eldest eligible child in the family and by £2·05 for each other child are estimated to be £695 million gross and £490 million net.

National Insurance Pension

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish figures showing the April 1991 value of the category A national insurance pension, at uprating dates each year since 1978, using the general index of retail prices, including housing costs.

Miss Widdecombe: Information on the real value of the state retirement pension in previous years at April 1991 prices will not be available until the RPI figure for that month is known. Figures on the value of the state retirement pension at April 1990 prices are set out in table 5 1(a) of the October 1990 edition of the DSS "Abstract of Statistics", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Pensioner Couples

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those benefits and their average value which are available to pensioner couples on basic pensions who are in receipt of income support.

Miss Widdecombe: The benefits listed in the table are available to pensioner couples on income support with basic pensions. They are also available to pensioner couples who do not receive income support.

Housing benefit
Community charge benefit
Mobility allowance[1]
Invalid care allowance[2]
Severe disability allowance
Invalidity benefit[3]
Sickness benefit[3]
Industrial injury benefit
War disablement pension
Attendance allowance
Help with NHS charges and payments from the social fund[4]

Notes:

[1] Mobility allowance continues to age 80 but cannot be claimed after age 66 (but mobility conditions must have been met before age 65).

[2] Invalid care allowance continues but cannot be claimed after age 60 for women and 65 for men.

[3] Invalidity benefit and sickness benefit can be paid up to five years beyond pension age.

[4] Crisis loans and payments for certain specific items are possible if customers are not on income support.

Whether or not any of these would actually be payable to any one couple would depend on their particular circumstances.

Information on the average amount of each benefit in payment to pensioner couples is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Social Fund

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the financial allocation to the social fund for each local office in Scotland and the actual sum spent in each case for the financial year ended 31 March 1991.

Mr. Scott: Information on allocations for 1991-92 and monthly expenditure up to February 1991 are available in the Library. The March 1991 figures will be available shortly.

Long-stay Patients

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the costs incurred by his Department from the discharge of patients from long-stay hospital beds to private nursing homes; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: No such assessment has been made as information about a claimant's previous place of residence is not collected.

Family Credit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of new claims for family credit were unsuccessful in each of last 24 months for which records are available; and what was the spending on advertising family credit during those months.

Mr. Jack: Of the new claims for family credit cleared during each of these months the percentage which was unsuccessful was as follows:

	Per cent.
April 1989	46·2
May 1989	64·6
June 1989	60·0
July 1989	52·2
August 1989	48·6
September 1989	48·4
October 1989	47·0
November 1989	48·4
December 1989	52·8
January 1990	53·4
February 1990	49·1
March 1990	49·5
April 1990	47·8
May 1990	45·0
June 1990	46·2
July 1990	47·0
August 1990	47·5
September 1990	49·5
October 1990	46·6
November 1990	45·1
December 1990	45·5
January 1991	49·4
February 1991	47·6
March 1991	48·4

During the same period the percentage of renewal claims which were unsuccessful ranged from 11·6 per cent. to 18·6 per cent.

Notes

1. The figures are for the four or five weeks ending on the last Friday of each month.
2. Unsuccessful claims includes those which were withdrawn or were invalid, as well as those where it was decided there was no entitlement to benefit.

It is not possible to express the spending on advertising on a month by month basis. The spending on each of the advertising campaigns during the period was as follows:

Advertising campaign	Expenditure (£)
April-June 1989	3,635,000
October 1989-January 1990	2,200,000
June-August 1990	2,394,000
February-March 1991	1,500,000

Income Support

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are in receipt of income support in Scotland at the latest date for which figures are available.

Miss Widdecombe [pursuant to the answer, 15 April, c. 89]: I regret that the hon. Member's question was incorrectly linked for answer. It should have received the following answer.

In May 1989, the latest date for which information is available, some 486,000 people in Scotland were in receipt of income support. This information is drawn from the May 1989 Annual Statistical Enquiry, a copy of which is in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Industrial Premises

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what evidence he has of the trends in investment by the private sector in new industrial and warehousing premises in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There is no clear statistical evidence from which trends in the volume of private sector industrial investment can be drawn. There are, however, encouraging signs of increased activity in this area.

During 1990, consistent with the Government's policy of encouraging the private sector to take a greater role in the development and management of industrial property in Scotland, the Scottish Development Agency disposed of property holdings valued at almost £140 million. The disposals included sites with development potential and we are aware that the new private sector owners have undertaken or plan to undertake industrial developments on a number of these.

It seems likely that owner-occupiers whose businesses are prospering will continue to invest in new units and extensions and that other businesses will follow as the economy recovers. Interest in speculative building, which has been constrained by low rents and recent high interest rates, is expected to revive as interest rates fall and rents increase to match building costs.

Household Statistics

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many adults over 18 years of age there are in Scotland at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Lang: The population of Scotland aged 18 years and over at 30 June 1990 is provisionally estimated to have been 3,940,000.

Training Organisations

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many approved training organisations there are in Scotland; and what are their names.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There were 305 approved training organisations in Scotland as at 31 March 1991.

Information about the names of these approved training organisations is set out in the table.

Information about additions or deletions from this list after 31 March 1991 is a matter for Scottish Enterprise, Highlands and Islands Enterprise and local enterprise companies.

TVEI

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland at 1990-91 prices, what is the expenditure on technical and vocational education initiative per school pupil in every year from 1985-86 to 1991-92.

Mr. Allan Stewart: TVEI can extend to every 14 to 18-year-old undergoing full-time education; it therefore includes students aged 16 to 18 attending colleges as well as school pupils in this age group. The education authorities have entered into and extended their participation in TVEI at varying rates over the years. Expenditure on a per school pupil basis would be available only at disproportionate cost. But spending is not necessarily geared to the number of students and any unit costs derived would not be meaningful. Total expenditure in Scotland on TVEI at 1990-91 prices is as follows:

Financial year	£ at constant (1990-91) prices
1985-86	3,087,131
1986-87	3,642,028
1987-88	7,624,724
1988-89	11,437,628
1989-90	12,631,256
1990-91	12,052,557
[1]1991-92	13,018,868

[1] Budget.

Employment Training

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of employment training trainees gained qualifications in Scotland in each year since employment training started.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is not available in the form requested. Information about leavers is obtained through a survey which started in July 1990. Returns from leavers are incomplete. Data provided by this survey about the percentage of employment training trainees gaining a qualification or a credit toward one is set out in the table:

	Percentage of leavers between July 1980 to March 1990	Percentage of leavers between April 1990 to October 1990
Obtained qualification or credit	22	30
Awaiting results at time of survey	5	4

Public Drunkenness

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy in respect of the decriminalisation of public drunkenness.

Mr. Lang: The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980 gave the police power to take a drunken offender to a designated place, as an alternative to arrest. The Government remain prepared to designate places as suitable for the care of drunken persons if the local statutory bodies so wish, and will in addition consider assisting with the capital costs of such projects. We have no proposals for further change to the criminal law in this regard.

Electoral Statistics

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland further to his answer of 25 February, Official Report, column 335, when he expects to be able to publish the total electorate for each parliamentary constituency in Scotland, as at 16 February 1991; and when he intends to write to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Shettleston.

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how long it usually takes for information to be made publicly available as to whether a driver had been drinking alcohol before driving and being killed.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information about whether a driver killed in a road accident had consumed alcohol would become publicly available only if evidence to that effect was led at subsequent court proceedings, including any fatal accident inquiry.

Alcohol-related Crime

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to include the specific statistical data of young persons under 18 years in each category of criminal convictions where alcohol was directly or indirectly involved in the crime.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Statistics on the age of persons convicted of drink-related offences such as drink driving, drunkenness and liquor licensing offences are already available. It is not feasible to collect regular statistical information on convictions for offences where alcohol was indirectly involved.

Scottish Enterprise

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of launching Scottish Enterprise and its associated local enterprise companies.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This is an operational matter for Scottish Enterprise and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Child Abuse

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many criminal convictions there have been for offences against children where children were abused by a parent in each year since 1979.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on the relationship between offenders and their victims is not collected centrally.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all crime statistics in each Scottish police authority, indicating each police division in order of crimes recorded for each category and give the percentage of increase in each category for every year since 1979.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not held centrally. Information for police authority areas is given in the annual reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary for Scotland, copies of which are available in the Library.

Planning Procedures

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland why he called in the planning consent for housing development at Fishers road, Port Seton; when he expects to announce his decision; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: These applications were notified to my right hon. Friend by East Lothian district council, the local planning authority, because the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department had objected to the use for housing of prime quality agricultural land which had not been allocated for development in the relevant development plans. My right hon. Friend called in the applications to allow him to examine more closely the arguments for releasing the land put forward by the district and regional councils, which both supported the proposal. The protection of prime quality agricultural land from development that could be satisfactorily accommodated elsewhere remains an objective of Government policy.

I expect my right hon. Friend to issue his decision shortly and will ensure that the hon. Member receives a copy of the decision letter.

Self-employed People

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the total number of people registered as self-employed in each Scottish parliamentary constituency.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The latest information available on the number of self-employed by parliamentary constituency comes from the 1981 census of population. This information is available from the NOMIS database in the House of Commons Library. Library staff are ready to assist in accessing the information if necessary.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the cost to date of the public affairs department of Grampian health board in preparing and issuing press releases giving publicity to NHS trust status for Aberdeen royal infirmary, Foresterhill site; and whether any costs will be charged directly to the group of senior managers and consultants who have decided to submit an application for NHS trust status.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The work involved is a small part of the activities of the public affairs department of Grampian health board, the cost of which is not separately identifiable. Health boards have a clear duty to provide assistance to trust candidates and it is quite appropriate for Grampian health board to issue press releases on behalf of the Foresterhill project manager and his team.

Steel Industry

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has submitted additional evidence to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on British Steel since 25 March.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On 27 March my right hon. Friend sent the Chairman of the Select Committee a copy of the final report on the Arthur D. Little study on the prospects for the steel industry in Scotland. My right hon. Friend has not submitted any evidence as such to the Committee since 25 March.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) when he last met the European Commissioner, Sir Leon Brittan, to discuss the steel industry; and if he will make a detailed statement on those discussions;

(2) if he will publish a minute of his meeting of 25 March with Sir Leon Brittan in so far as it concerns the Scottish steel industry;

(3) what information he received from Sir Leon Brittan on 25 March with regard to the European Commission's attitude to a potential sale of the Ravenscraig and Clydesdale steel works; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what information he has received from the European Commissioner, Sir Leon Brittan, relating to statements made by Sir Robert Scholey concerning the attitude of the Commission to a possible sale of Ravenscraig and Clydesdale steel works.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend met Sir Leon on 25 March. It was a private meeting at which a number of subjects were dismissed and my right hon. Friend does not intend to make a detailed statement. But one of the subjects was steel; Sir Leon was able to confirm the Commission's view that any refusal by British Steel to offer the Ravenscraig hot strip mill for sale to a European competitor did not amount to abuse of a dominant position. The Commission was not able to take a view on any proposed sale of the mill until it received a specific application. However, as my right hon. Friend indicated to the Select Committee on 12 December, he is not aware of any powers that the Commission has to prevent the mill from being sold and continuing in production within the Community.

Manufacturing Jobs

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many manufacturing jobs have been lost in Scotland in each year since 1989.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In December 1990, the latest available date, there were 401,100 employees in employment in manufacturing in Scotland. This represents a small fall of 1,300 (0·3 per cent.) compared with December 1989. Over the same period the number of manufacturing employees in Great Britain fell by 130,000 (2·5 per cent.).

Quarries

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the quarries in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is contained in the British Geological Surveys publication "Directory of Mines and Quarries", a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Firearms

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people have been fined for illegal possession of firearms in Scotland in each year since 1985.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In 1989, 36 people were fined for offences under section 1 of the Firearms Act 1968 of illegal possession of a firearm. This figure excludes cases where illegal possession was not the main charge. Statistics for earlier years are not available.

Motorway Lighting

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria are used to decide whether any part of a motorway in Scotland should be provided with lighting.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Lighting on motorways is normally provided when cost benefit calculations show that the benefits of a reduction in the number of night-time injury accidents would exceed the cost of its installation and subsequent maintenance. White-lining, cats' eyes and other markings are considered adequate in ordinary circumstances and generally, on motorways, lighting would afford only marginal road safety benefits which would not justify the cost.

The detailed criteria are set out in the Scottish Office Technical Memorandum SH6/89 ("Appraisal of New and Replacement Lighting on Trunk Roads and Trunk Road Motorways"), a copy of which I am arranging to be placed in the Library.

Environmental Health Officers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many environmental health officers have been employed by local authorities in Scotland for each year since 1980.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 28 March 1991]: This information is not held centrally.

SCOTLAND

Opencast Mining

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list all those areas in Scotland for which planning permission has been granted for opencast mining.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 19 April 1991]: Under current legislation my right hon. Friend deals only with applications for opencast coal operations which come before him on appeal. Up to 29 February 1984 opencast coal site applications were the concern of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. Thereafter, under transitional arrangements, they transferred to my right hon. Friend until the local planning authorities assumed responsibility on 11 December 1987. I understand from British Coal (Scotland), which holds central records, that the details requested are as follows:

Police Operations

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people have been killed in police pursuits in Scotland (a) excluding and (b) including police officers in each of the last five years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 19 April 1991]: Figures have been collected centrally only for the past four years. Since 1987 there have been six deaths—four in 1987, one in 1988, one in 1989 and none in 1990. All arose from incidents where a police vehicle was in direct or indirect pursuit of a fleeing suspect vehicle, or responding to an emergency call; none of those killed was a police officer.

HEALTH

Cancer Screening

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects a breast cancer screening programme to become operational in the South and East Cumbria health authorities' areas.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Screening will begin in South Cumbria at Barrow in June 1991 and in East Cumbria at Carlisle in September 1991. All eligible women should have received their first screening invitation by 1993.

General Practitioner Targets

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of general practitioners in Cleveland have achieved their targets for child immunisation, pre-school boosters and cervical cytology.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: On 31 March 1991 the following percentage of GPs in Cleveland qualified for target payments in respect of their achievements on 1 October 1990:

	Percentage of GPs achieving targets
	Higher	Lower	Total
Childhood immunisation	61	32	93
Pre-school booster	41	37	78
Cervical cytology	83	17	100

I congratulate all those concerned on this excellent achievement.

Immunisation (Children)

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of children are immunised against diphtheria, whooping cough and measles in the South and East Cumbria health authorities' areas together with the corresponding averages for the Northern region, England, the United Kingdom as a whole and the World Health Organisation's target percentage.

Mr. Dorrell: Provisional figures for 1989-90 are as follows:

	Diphtheria	Whooping Cough	Measles (MMR[1])
South Cumbria DHA	96	85	93
East Cumbria DHA	93	83	90
Northern RHA	90	79	86
England	89	78	84

[1] A combined vaccine against measles mumps and rubella (MMR) replaced measles-only vaccine from 1 October 1988.

It is not possible to provide an average percentage for the United Kingdom as a whole because of differences in methods of collecting the figures. The World Health Organisation's target for its European region was 90 per cent. coverage by 1990. More recent estimates, by the COVER—Cover of Vaccination Evaluated Rapidly—programme, managed by the communicable disease surveillance centre, show that by February 1991 the percentages for England had reached 90 for diphtheria (and tetanus and polio), 89 for MMR and 85 for whooping cough.

Speech Therapy

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money was spent by health authorities on the provision of speech therapy in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dorrell: Health authorities spent £43·4 million on speech therapy services in 1989-90. This represents an increase in real terms of 138 per cent. since 1978-79.

Appointments

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what way appointments to health authorities are considered and made.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State appoints the chairman and non-executive members of regional health authorities and the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals. My right hon. Friend also appoints the chairmen of district health authorities and family health services authorities. Regional health authorities appoint the non-executive members of district health authorities and family health services authorities.

There is no statutory requirement to consult. Nominations of suitable people willing to serve on a health authority from various sources are always welcome and considered.

Hearing Therapists

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his assessment of the future role of the hearing therapist profession; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Hearing therapists play an important role in the rehabilitation and after-care of people with a hearing loss. Officials are in discussion with the British Society of Hearing Therapists and the national health service training directorate about the possibility of developing a national vocational qualification in hearing therapy.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how often the range of NHS hearing aids is reviewed; and what steps are taken to ensure that this range is updated in line with technical developments.

Mr. Dorrell: Contracts for the standard range of NHS hearing aids are normally awarded for one or two year periods and are then subject to review and re-tender. Technical developments are kept under continuing review, having regard to clinical suitability, reliability and cost.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance is given by his Department to regional health authorities to assist them with drawing up their budget allocation for hearing aids and for setting their staffing levels within the audiology service.

Mr. Dorrell: None. It is for health authorities to allocate resources for the purchase of hearing aids and audiology services in the light of local needs.

Norwich DHA

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the expenditure by Norwich district health authority for the latest available year on the general practitioner contract, general practitioner fund holders, the hospital's internal market and the resource management initiative.

Mr. Dorrell: The information is not held centrally in the form requested.

In 1989-90 the total revenue expenditure on hospital and community health services within Norwich district health authority was £122,580,000 of which expenditure on hospital services amounted to £95,948,000.

The East Anglian regional health authority received £158,000 of central funds in 1990-91 to support resource management projects within Norwich district health authority.

The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Colin Walker, the chairman of East Anglian regional health authority, for details of expenditure on general practitioner contracts and general practitioner fund holders.

Long-stay Patients

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department has any plans to prevent the transfer by district health authorities of financial responsibility for the long-stay care of frail, elderly patients which occurs when such patients are discharged from long-stay hospital beds to private nursing homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department's guidance on hospital discharge procedures requires a patient who is to be discharged to a private nursing home to be notified in writing whether or not the health authority will meet the fees of the home under a contractual arrangement. It also makes it clear that no one should be unwillingly discharged to such care if it means that he, she or a relative will be personally responsible for the home's charges.

United Kingdom Residents from Mauritius

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people from the island of Mauritius resided in the United Kingdom at the last available date.

Mr. Dorrell: The estimated number of people born in Mauritius but resident in the United Kingdom is 22,000. This estimate has been derived by averaging the results of the 1987, 1988, and 1989 labour force surveys.

TRANSPORT

Fenchurch Street Rail Service

12. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any proposals from British Rail to reduce the load factor on peak-time trains on the Fenchurch Street line to 100 per cent.

Mr. Freeman: The load factor objective for rolling stock of the type operated on the Fenchurch Street line is 110 per cent. with no standing over 20 minutes except through choice. Journeys to Fenchurch Street from Basildon take more than 20 minutes, so the load factor objective is, therefore, already 100 per cent. from there. We have received no proposals from British Rail to reduce the target to 100 per cent. throughout Network SouthEast.

Motorways

13. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to extend the motorway network.

Mr. Chope: Our plans for extending the motorway network were set out in "Trunk Roads England into the 1990s" published in February last year. Subsequent proposals to upgrade the A1 to motorway status from the M25 to Tyneside were announced in July 1990.

Road Improvements, Devon

14. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what major road improvements he plans for north Devon in co-operation with Devon county council during the next five years.

Mr. Chope: The 47-mile long north Devon link road was completed in 1989 at a cost of £47 million and the Barnstaple and Bideford bypasses were completed in 1987 and 1989 at a cost of £21 million and £17 million respectively.

The level of investment in roads in north Devon in the next five years will not be as great, but schemes put forward by Devon county council for transport supplementary grant will be considered on their merits.

London Assessment Studies

15. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give starting dates for the public transport schemes in the London assessment studies that he intends should proceed.

Mr. Freeman: Subject to the passage of relevant legislation, we hope that construction of the Lewisham extension of the Docklands light railway will begin in 1992 and construction of the east-west crossrail in 1993.

Other schemes recommended in the assessment studies may be brought forward later. The alignment of the Chelsea-Hackney underground line has already been safeguarded.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what was the total cost to his Department of the work involved in the western environmental improvement route assessment study;

(2) what was the total cost to his Department of the work involved in the South London assessment study; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what was the total cost to his Department of the work involved in the South Circular assessment study; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what was the total cost to his Department of the work involved in the west London assessment study; and if he will make a statement;

(5) what was the total cost to his Department of the work involved in the east London assessment study; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The cost of the four London assessment studies was:

	£ million
South Circular	2·9
South London	3·4
West London	2·7
East London	3·0

The western environmental improvement route was a scheme in the national road programme. It had reached the public consultation stage, at a study cost of £1·1 million. The announcement of decisions on the assessment studies indicated that a number of the most important public transport schemes identified in the studies were under active consideration, that it had been decided not to proceed with any of the major road schemes recommended by consultants, but that the limited road improvements specified would be pursued. Since then Bills to authorise east-west crossrail and the extension of the Docklands light railway to Lewisham have been announced, and the line of the Chelsea-Hackney line has been safeguarded. The limited road improvements specified have been subject to initial appraisal and an announcement will be made shortly.

Prestwick Airport

16. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with BAA about the future of Prestwick airport.

Mr. McLoughlin: Prestwick airport is one of a number of subjects which my right hon. and learned Friend has discussed with the senior management of BAA in recent months.

London Orbital Motorway

17. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for an additional outer London orbital motorway.

Mr. Chope: None.

Buses, London

18. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the projected trend in bus usage in London over the next two years.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that London Transport expects little overall change in bus usage in London over the next two years. The Government have issued a consultation paper on the deregulation of the provision of bus services in London and believe that such deregulation offers the best opportunity for increasing patronage in the longer term.

Rail Privatisation

19. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss privatisation.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. and learned Friend meets the chairman of British Rail regularly, to discuss a variety of issues.

British Rail Investment

20. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it is policy to make approval for any BR investment proposals conditional upon orders being placed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail's purchasing policy is to obtain the best overall value for money through competition. About 95 per cent. of British Rail's requirements for supplies and services are currently ordered within the United Kingdom. Decisions on the placing of railway orders are commercial matters for British Rail and it would be inappropriate for Government approvals of British Rail investment proposals to be conditional on orders being placed in the home market.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the 1991, 1992 and 1993 amount of public funds given to British Rail to improve passenger and goods access from Scotland to the continent via the channel tunnel.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail plans to invest up to £1·4 billion on works linked to the channel tunnel in this financial year and the next two. BR's investment is financed from a combination of internal and external finance, including borrowing. Section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act forbids Government subsidy for international rail services.

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out figures for rail investment, in cash and real terms, for the last 20 years, and the estimate for next year.

Mr. Freeman: Actual figures up to 1990-91 are listed in the table:

Rail Investment

Year	Cash £ million	1990-91 Prices £ million
1970	48	329
1971	59	371
1972	73	424

1978	208	526
1979	248	537
1980	304	556
1981	277	462
1982	243	379
1983	252	375

1985-86	399	536
1986-87	399	519
1987-88	526	648
1988-89	545	626
1989-90	696	752
1990-91	[2]822	822

[1] 12 month equivalent.
[2] Estimated outturn.
The definition of rail investment includes investment in Freightliners, British Rail Maintenance Ltd. and British Rail Engineering Ltd. but excludes the laying of continuous welded track which BR do not now classify as investment.

Plans for this financial year and the next two—1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94—are given in the departmental report 1991 (Cm. 1507).

Motorway Lighting

21. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for improving and extending the lighting on the M4 and other motorways.

Mr. Chope: The lighting requirements on all motorways in England, including the M4, are kept under continuous review. Plans are in hand for more lighting on the M1, M5, M20, M40, M56 and on the M62. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is responsible for the M4 motorway in Wales.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his most recent estimate of the potential safety improvements and increased capacity of motorways resulting from the installation of lighting.

Mr. Chope: Research in this country and elsewhere has shown that the average reduction in night-time accidents attributable to road lighting is about 30 per cent. There is, however, substantial variation between locations, depending on type of road and other factors. Evidence is not available on the effect of lighting on motorway capacity.

Rail Services (South-East)

22. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss rail services in the south-east.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. and learned Friend and I frequently discuss NSE services with the chairman of British Rail.

London Regional Transport

23. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will increase the funding for London Regional Transport for 1991-92.

Mr. Freeman: The Government are reviewing the level of funding required by London Transport in 1991-92. An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many passengers travelled on London Transport on average (a) in 1990, (b) five years ago and (c) 15 years ago; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is given in the table.

Passenger journeys on London Transport

million

Year	Underground	Buses[1]	Docklands Light Railway
1975	601	1,455	Nil
1985	740	1,154	Nil
1990	775	1,220	8·2

[1]Including tendered services.

London Underground (Crime)

24. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the latest figures for violent crimes on the London Underground.

Mr. Freeman: I was pleased to announce on 20 March that violent crime on London Underground has been reduced for the third successive year. In 1990, there were 1,341 violent crimes recorded on the underground—a reduction of 23 per cent. on the previous year—while passengers made some 800 million journeys.

A2 Roadworks

23. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the interruption of traffic during the roadworks on the A2 from the M2 to London, since 1990.

Mr. Chope: The roadworks concerned are part of a phased programme of contracts to carry out essential major maintenance and provide hard shoulders along the whole of the A2 trunk road in north-west Kent between the London boundary and the M2 Motorway.

I regret that works of this magnitude on such a heavily trafficked road inevitably cause some degree of disturbance. But my Department will continue to take all practicable measures to keep inconvenience and delay to a minimum, compatible with the safety both of the public and the road operatives.

Channel Tunnel

26. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received from British Rail any proposals on the location of the recent London terminus for the channel tunnel, in the light of the Government's declared commitment to the Chelsea-Hackney crossrail.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail's study of alternative routes for a high-speed rail link to the channel tunnel includes the siting of a second London terminal. We expect to receive the board's proposals soon.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss a channel tunnel freight terminal in Greater Manchester.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 11 March.

East Coast Motorway

27. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to consider the possible environmental consequences of the construction of the proposed east coast motorway.

Mr. Chope: Proposals for an east coast motorway were the subject of a feasibility study commissioned by a consortium of local authorities and private sector organisations. This Department was not involved.

Airlines

28. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the Government's policy towards maintaining a multi-airline industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Government's policy is to promote free and fair competition in aviation, so that there remains a healthy, competitive airline industry in the United Kingdom which meets the needs of users. The market is diverse enough to sustain a variety of United Kingdom-based carriers as well as their foreign competitors.

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many awards have been won by the advertising campaign to reduce drink driving.

Mr. Chope: The Christmas 1990 campaign won two major awards last week in the British television advertising awards 1991. Twelve other major awards have been won by the "Drinking and Driving Wrecks Lives" campaign since 1987.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how long it usually takes for information to be made publicly available as to whether a driver had been drinking alcohol before driving and being killed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

It is possible for information about whether a driver killed in a road accident had consumed alcohol to become publicly available in a variety of circumstances, for example, during criminal proceedings against someone else involved in the same accident. But such information is most likely to emerge from any publicity given to a coroners' inquest into the death of the driver if the coroner, who is an independent judicial officer, admits evidence of this nature at the hearing. The date of any inquest is a matter for the coroner to decide and the length of time between the death and the inquest will vary according to the circumstances of each individual case.

A66

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give a time scale for all the improvements to the A66 Scotch Corner-Penrith road which he had in mind.

Mr. Chope: There are three schemes in the road programme for the A66 between Scotch Corner and Penrith with a current timetable as follows:

Bowes to County Boundary
Under construction
Expected completion—Autumn 1992

Stainsmore to Banksgate
Order Publication—Summer 1991
Start of Works—Spring 1993

Stainburn to Great Clifton
Order Publication—Summer 1992
Start of Works—Summer 1994

Environmental Assessment Studies

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans there are to update the manual of environmental appraisal to include the issues raised by the European Community's directive on environmental assessment; and if he intends to consult outside organisations on this matter.

Mr. Chope: It is a measure of the comprehensiveness of the manual of environmental appraisal that no changes were necessary to implement in full the European Council directive on environmental assessment (85/337/EEC).

A13

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans there are for changes to the A13 highway; and whether there will be an opportunity for the public to object and a public inquiry held into any of its stages.

Mr. Chope: A number of improvements are under way or planned for the A13 trunk road. These are listed in the table. Where there is a need for orders under the Highways Act or legislation relating to compulsory purchase the public will have the opportunity to object after draft orders are published. Depending on the status, number and content of those objections the Secretary of State will decide whether to hold a public inquiry.

A13/Butcher Row	Junction improvement	—
A13/West India Dock Road (Interim)	Junction improvement	—
A13/West India Dock Road (Final)	Junction improvement	Side Roads/CP0

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will tabulate in the Official Report all road works under way and which will be undertaken on the A13 Commercial road and East India Dock road between Aldgate and Canning Town until the end of 1991; and what are the estimated consequential minimum flows of traffic in each direction in passenger car units per hour for each phase of the works.

Mr. Chope: The A13 Commercial road from Aldgate to Butcher Row is the responsibility of the London borough of Tower Hamlets. The Department has two schemes under way this year on the A13 between Butcher Row and Canning Town. One is at the junction with West India Dock road where there are five remaining works phases. A minimum of one lane in each direction will be kept open, widening to two lanes at the approaches to the traffic signals. The second is at Leamouth road which has two remaining works phases with a minimum of two lanes in each direction. The capacity of a lane under these circumstances is about 1,500 passenger car units per hour, although these figures are likely to be constrained by the junctions. There will be three areas of resurfacing with renewal of footways and other essential maintenance works including work by statutory undertakers which may affect traffic flows from time to time.

Tolls

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all tolls charged on roads within the responsibility of his Department, and the recipients of the income.

Mr. Chope: The only tolled facility for which the Department is entirely responsible is the Severn bridge on the M4. Tolls are £1 for cars and £2 for HGVs. The income accrues to the Exchequer.

There are other tolled crossings, for which the Department is not responsible, which link trunk roads or motorways. They are:

	Tolls
Location	Car	HGV	Recipient of toll income
Dartford Tunnels (A282/M25)	80p	£2·10	Dartford River Crossing Ltd.
Humber Bridge (A15)	£1·60	£6·50—£10·90	Humber Bridge Board
Tyne Tunnel (A1)	50p	£1·00	Tyne and Wear PTA
Tamar Bridge (A38)	40p	£1·35—£1·80	Tamar Bridge and Torpoint Ferry Joint Committee
Selby Bridge (A19—A63)	7p	[1]6p	Company of Proprietors of Selby Bridge
Dunham Bridge (A57)	15p	10p per axle	Dunham Bridge Company

[1]per tonne (gross weight)

Jubilee Line

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total level of grant from his Department to London Transport for the Jubilee line extension; if he will list its distribution by year; and for each year what percentage it is of the total London Transport grant allocation.

Mr. Freeman: In Common with other public expenditure, the grant to be paid to LT is determined only for a three-year forward period. Figures have therefore only been settled for the years up to 1993-94. These are as follows:

	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93	1993-94
£ million	40	121	251	376
Percentage of total grant to LT	7	18	33	36

Trunk Roads

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whom he intends to consult on the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment report before formulating policies to implement any recommendations.

Mr. Chope: The Department will consult interested parties before implementing major changes to the values or underlying principle of the inputs to trunk road scheme appraisal. SACTRA itself has already consulted widely in preparing its report on environmental assessment.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment to report on its review of environmental evaluation; and if he will give the working title and the anticipated title of the report.

Mr. Chope: The report from SACTRA is now not expected until late summer. The title of the report has not been decided.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking in respect of the report of the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment on the prospect of nature conservation in the appraisal of trunk roads.

Mr. Chope: The report from SACTRA has not yet been received and is now not expected until late summer.

M66

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether there will be a further public inquiry into the M66 line order at the M66/A664 interchange; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Yes. While the route of the motorway is fixed a new connecting roads order for the M66/A664 junction was published last January. The inquiry will provide an opportunity for interested persons to comment on or object to those proposals.

Drivers (Qualifying Age)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to change the qualifying age to enable people to drive a motor vehicle in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Chope: No.

St John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what facilities he has made available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Chope: My Department is in contact with the St. John Ambulance Brigade and will be giving publicity to the "Over to you, John" appeal through its in-house journal.

Disabled People

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what reports he has received recently from the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee; and what response he has made to them.

Mr. Freeman: I have received two reports this year. "Information and Mobility" presents the findings of a public hearing held by the committee in March 1990 on the importance of information and communications in enabling disabled people to travel. The second report, "Mobility for Britain's Entire Population", develops the committee's views on future policy direction towards achieving a public transport system which is fully accessible to disabled people.

These latest reports, together with earlier reports from the committee, are being studied and will contribute significantly to my Department's thinking in this area.

Highway Code

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he plans to introduce to inform drivers of the contents of the Highway Code.

Mr. Chope: It is the responsibility of all road users to be aware of the contents of the Highway Code. The code is already widely available through HMSO, booksellers and an increasing number of other retail outlets. The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency also supplies copies on request to applicants for provisional driving licences. My Department takes every opportunity to promote increased public awareness of the safety measures in the code.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on the basis of the toll assumptions in the table in clause 9 of the Severn Bridges Bill, when payment for the present Severn bridge will be completed and what will be the assumed gross income in the final year; and on the basis of the same table, what is the assumed income of the present bridge in 1992, 1993, 1994 and 1995.

Mr. Chope: I very much regret that due to an administrative error there was a delay in responding to the right hon. Member's earlier questions on this subject. I can now refer him to the answer I gave him on 18 April, columns 214-15.

Learner Drivers

Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps he is taking to raise the level of public awareness of the changes to the law resulting from regulations coming into force on 1 October 1990 concerning the supervision of learner drivers;

(2) what steps he is taking to monitor public awareness of the changes to the law resulting from regulations coming into force on 1 October 1990 concerning the supervision of learner drivers.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 16 April 1991]: The regulations were drawn up after extensive consultation, and three separate press notices were issued to publicise their introduction, which were widely reported.

In addition, details of the new qualifying conditions for supervising drivers are set out in a leaflet which is issued with all new provisional driving licences. The leaflet stresses that it is the responsibility of the learner driver to ensure that the supervising driver is appropriately qualified and points out that it is an offence for both parties if those conditions are not met.

The new requirement is also set out on the provisional licence itself, and described in the guide for learner drivers, "Your Driving Test", published by the Driving Standards Agency.

M20

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he now has an opening date for the M20 motorway Ashford to Hollingbourne section.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 April 1991]: The M20 motorway between Maidstone and Ashford is being built under two contracts. The first is due for completion this month, but cannot be opened until the second contract is ready. The second contract is due for completion in July, but work is ahead of programme and I now hope that it will be possible for the road to be opened before July.

I shall inform my hon. Friend as soon as an opening date is fixed.

ENVIRONMENT

Lambeth Council

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what are the current debts for rent and rates owed to Lambeth council which have not been written off;

(2) what part of the budget of Lambeth council of £315·5 million for 1991-92 represents payment of interest on moneys borrowed against (a) rent arrears and (b) rate and poll tax arrears;

(3) how much money is currently borrowed by Lambeth council against (a) rent arrears and (b) rate and poll tax arrears and exclusive of the additional sums which he has permitted Lambeth to borrow.

Mr. Key: On the latest information provided to my Department by the council, Lambeth is owed £28·9 million in respect of rents, £28·0 million in respect of domestic rates and £13·7 million in respect of business rates.

It is not possible to provide the further information requested by the hon. Member since local authority debt is managed corporately and loans are not raised against particular assets.

Emissions

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to press for existing EC directives on sulphur dioxide and nitrogen dioxide to be revised to reflect World Health Organisation guidelines.

Mr. Baldry: The preambles to the present directives make it clear that the limit values for which they provide are based on work by the World Health Organisation.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many nitrogen oxide monitoring stations there are in the United Kingdom; what is the average number of such stations amongst the EC nations; and how many such stations there are in (a) Holland and (b) Japan.

Mr. Baldry: My Department funds 12 nitrogen oxide samplers in the United Kingdom, seven of which are for the purposes of the European directive on nitrogen dioxide. The number of directive sites in other EC countries is as follows:

	Number
Belgium	21
Germany	200
Denmark	11
Spain	15
France	85
Greece	33
Ireland	6
Italy	34
Luxembourg	4

	Number
Netherlands	53
Portugal	17

I understand that in 1989 there were 1,337 nitrogen oxide monitoring sites in Japan.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the sites used for the monitoring of sulphur dioxide (a) in 1982 and (b) in 1991.

Mr. Baldry: I am arranging for a list of these sites to be placed in the Library.

Estate Action Schemes

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money has been spent each year since 1987 under the estate action scheme in (a) Stockton, (b) Middlesbrough and (c) Hartlepool; and how many dwellings have been improved or created.

Mr. Yeo: The table shows the amounts approved by the Department under the estate action scheme in each financial year since 1986-87 in respect of Stockton, Middlesbrough and Hartlepool.

	Stockton £	Middlesbrough £	Hartlepool £
1986-87	341,243	424,500	562,271
1987-88	186,895	181,118	842,240
1988-89	472,000	810,117	1,546,107
1989-90	1,593,549	272,026	2,069,192
1990-91	764,019	221,189	1,059,150
Total	3,357,706	1,908,950	6,078,960

As a result of these approvals a total of 2,212 dwellings have been improved in the three local authority areas concerned.

The figures in the table represent a high proportion of the total expenditure on estate action schemes. They were supplemented by resources from the authorities' mainstream housing investment programme. It will take a little time to establish the total expenditure on these schemes and I will write to my hon. Friend when I have full details.

Smoke Control Areas

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many successful prosecutions there have been of suppliers of unauthorised petroleum coke in smoke control areas throughout the United Kingdom in each year since 1987; and if he will identify the local authority area and the name of the supplier.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not available to my Department.

Advice Services

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether standard spending assessments take account of the provision of advice services and section 38 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.

Mr. Portillo: Provision for these services up to a standard level is covered by the all other services element of standard spending assessments.

Trade in Wildlife

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures are currently being examined in order to impose and extend the controls on the import of species which are unlikely to survive in captivity.

Mr. Baldry: Discussions are taking place in the European Community on a proposed regulation to improve and extend the controls on trade in wildlife. This includes provisions that would enable restrictions to be imposed on the import of species which are unlikely to survive shipment or captivity. A draft of the regulation is expected to be published for consultation early in the summer.

Travelling Fairs

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make a statement on the outcome of his consultations with local authorities on travelling fairs;

(2) what recent representations he has received from the Showmen's Guild of Great Britain on problems associated with travelling fair grounds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: I have received no representations from the Showmen's Guild of Great Britain about the problems associated with travelling fair grounds, nor have I consulted local authorities about travelling fairs. However, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside on 20 December, column 273, about sites from which travelling showpeople base their activities. My officials have prepared some draft planning policy guidance about these sites, and invited comments from the Showmen's Guild. When we have these comments we intend to issue a revised draft for public consultation, involving the local authority associations.

Poll Tax

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will examine all outstanding poll tax cases currently the subject of prosecution before the courts with respect to reviewing continuation of the prosecutions.

Mr. Key: No. Community charge payers are under an obligation to pay their charge and local authorities must make all reasonable efforts to recover the charge from those who have not paid.

Parks Conference

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution he is making to the fourth international parks conference in Caracas in 1992.

Mr. Baldry: The Government's statutory advisor, the Countryside Commission for England, intends to submit a number of papers to the organisers, the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources, for possible inclusion in the programme of the fourth world congress on national parks and protected areas. It is for the IUCN to determine the final programme.

Kuwait (Pollution)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the results to be available of the UNEP environmental assessment in relation to the effect of hydrocarbons in the food chain and elsewhere in Kuwait; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 17 April, Official Report, c. 183. UNEP estimates that the completion date for its survey and assessment work is on environmental damage generally likely to be 15 July 1991.

UN Conference on the Environment and Development

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for consultations in the preparatory process to the United Nations conference on the environment and development which is due to be held in Brazil in 1992.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 13 April 1991]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside on 10 December to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), c. 266.

Water Supplies

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to require the water companies to enable customers who wish to do so to spread their payments over monthly periods of at least 10 months.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 19 April 1991]: No. Companies are already required by condition G of their individual instruments of appointment to submit to the Director General of Water Services for approval a copy of a code of practice for customers, describing arrangements for the payment of bills by domestic customers including information about payment by instalments and budget plans.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to seek a reduction in, or removal of, the EC co-responsibility levy on milk.

Mr. Curry: The Government have always opposed the co-responsibility levy and will continue to press for its abolition provided that the cost is offset by price cuts on a sufficient scale.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether there is a minimum retail price per pint for the sale of liquid milk to the consumer.

Mr. Gummer: No. Statutory controls over the retail price of milk ceased with effect from 1 January 1985.

Whaling

Sir John Farr: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to promote within the European Economic Community a total ban on commercial and scientific whaling.

Mr. Curry: The European Community has not assumed responsibility for policy on whaling, but no whaling, whether commercial or scientific, is believed to take place in Community waters. Further, the Community prohibits trade in whale products through its implementation of the convention on international trade in endangered species. We will continue to press within the International Whaling Commission for the conservation of whales and for scientific research to be carried out by non-lethal methods wherever possible.

Honey

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a study of the problem of residues, brought about by the use of acaracides in the treatment of honey bees, in imported and home-produced honey, and the related effect of herbicides.

Mr. Maclean: Supplies of imported and home-produced honey are sampled for analysis for the presence of the antimicrobial compound fumagillin and for various pesticides. We have no plans at present to extend this testing to include acaracides and herbicides but will keep the situation under review.

Farm Waste

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he hopes to introduce regulations to control the disposal of farm wastes, to replace the code of good agricultural practice.

Mr. Curry: We have no plans to do so. The unconsented pollution of controlled waters, whether from farm wastes or any other cause, is already an offence under section 107 of the Water Act 1989. The Government recently increased from £2,000 to £20,000 the maximum fine applicable in magistrates courts for such offences. The forthcoming new code of good agricultural practice for the protection of water will give detailed practical advice to farmers on how to avoid pollution. Failure to comply with it could be taken into account in any legal proceedings for a pollution offence.

Water Pollution

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the long-term damage to wildlife of lochs, streams, and rivers caused by chronic pollution from agricultural runoff, after slurry has been spread on fields.

Mr. Curry: Land run-off accounts for approximately 10 per cent. of serious pollution incidents caused by agriculture, and about 2 per cent. of serious incidents from all causes. The Department is helping to support a research project designed to provide detailed information on the effect of land use on river quality and fish populations in the River Torridge catchment. We share the concern to reduce farm pollution of watercourses and the Government have introduced a wide range of measures designed to help achieve this.

Organophosphorous Sheep Dip

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many sheep carcases were tested in the past five years for organophosphates residues, expressed as a percentage of all sheep slaughtered.

Mr. Curry: In the five years 1986-90, 889 sheep carcases were tested for organophosphate residues which represents a little over 0·001 per cent. of the number slaughtered but about 1 per cent. of the number of sheep flocks in the United Kingdom. No levels hazardous to human health have been found, but should that situation change a more intensive sampling regime would be introduced.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what investigations he is conducting into possible contamination by organophosphates of water supplies, sheepmeat and farm and market workers.

Mr. Maclean: Organophosphorus pesticides generally decompose rapidly within the environment and are not normally expected to reach water. All water companies have been asked to consult ADAS about the use of all pesticides within their water supply areas. Companies have drawn up lists for monitoring purposes of those pesticides which are likely to reach water supplies. In some areas this list includes organophosphorus pesticides. The results of monitoring have not indicated problems with these pesticides.

Monitoring for organophosphorus residues in United Kingdom-produced sheepmeat is carried out under the national surveillance scheme. The results for 1989 are included in the recently published annual report of the veterinary medicines directorate. No residues were found above the advisory maximum limit.

The Health and Safety Executive has commissioned a three-year research project into the frequency and severity of acute pesticide poisoning incidents, including organophosphorus and whether they can result in long-term health effects. The executive also surveyed 25 sheep dipping sites during 1990 to ascertain the health effects of exposure to sheep dips and in particular to those containing organophosphorus.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he is planning to introduce new regulations or recommendations on the use and disposal of sheep dip.

Mr. Maclean: It is already an offence under the Water Act 1989 to pollute a watercourse. In 1988 and 1989 four farmers were prosecuted for sheep dip pollution incidents. No further regulations are planned.

Under the Medicines Act 1968, sheep dip products must be licensed before they can be marketed. Existing licensed sheep dip products are currently subject to review by scientists in the veterinary medicines directorate to ensure that the most up-to-date safety standards apply. The review must be completed this year under EC rules. Any sheep dip products which fail to meet these standards will have their licences revoked.

New guidance notes on disposal are currently being prepared by the VMD and will be available in July. A code of good agricultural practice for the protection of water is also being prepared by the Ministry, which will include advice about use and disposal of sheep dip. This will also be published in July.

Animals (Live Exports)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further steps are being taken to improve the conditions of animals who are sent to the continent as live exports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Discussions are continuing on Commission proposals for a new Community regulation on protection of animals during transport. The Government are pressing for the adoption of high welfare standards for all transport of animals in the Community.

Fishing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many fishing vessels in each port in England have been put up for sale since the introduction of the EC fishing regulations that came into force this year.

Mr. Curry: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to the hon. Member on 23 January at column 245.

Fisheries Council

Mr. Harris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Fisheries Council held in Luxembourg on 18 April.

Mr. Curry: I attended the EC Council of Fisheries Ministers in Luxembourg on 18 April 1991 with Lord Strathclyde, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Scottish Office.

The Council had an exchange of views on the Commission's communication about the common fisheries policy. There was general recognition that fishing effort against many stocks needs to be reduced. I made it clear that the basic framework of the common fisheries policy is sound, but some improvements are needed. In particular total allowable catches and quotas, together with the principle of relative stability, are a central element, but need better support from improved technical conservation measures and enforcement. The Commission will now prepare by the end of this year the report provided for in the basic CFP regulation 170/83.

The Council had a further discussion of the Commission's proposals for technical conservation measures. The Council will return to this issue at its next meeting in July.

Biodiversity Convention

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his policy on the Biodiversity convention being prepared for the United Nations conference on Environment and Development being held in Rio De Janeiro in June 1992.

Mr. Baldry: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 4.26 of the Environment White Paper, "This Common Inheritance", (Cmnd. 1200), confirming the Government's support for international efforts led by the United Nations Environment Programme to agree a global convention for the conservation of biological diversity. It is intended that the convention should be ready for signing during the 1992 conference.

Flooding

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what local authority representations he has had in the last two years about the way his Department funds and administers sea defence, coast protection and river flooding schemes; what changes he has made to his policy in the past two years; and if he will now reconsider his current policy.

Mr. Curry: During the past two years, we have received 40 representations from local authorities about the funding and administration of sea defence, coast protection and river flooding schemes. These were primarily about the availability of capital allocation or supplementary credit approvals for schemes; changes to the method of calculating the grant rate for coast protection work which was made necessary because of the changes to the system of financing of local authorities; general questions about the approval and progress of schemes; and about the level and availability of grant. There have been no changes in the policy over the last two years with regard to either the funding or administration of such schemes and we have no plans to make changes in the foreseeable future. We have continued to increase the grant available for flood and coastal defence work, and over the period from 1989-90 to 1993-94 provision will have increased by nearly 80 per cent. from £35·9 million to £63·4 million.

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will now bring forward proposals to enable one authority to be responsible for sea defence and coast protection and river flooding prevention to replace the existing multi-authority system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The present arrangements, which take full advantage of local knowledge, are well understood by the authorities concerned. The arrangements have worked well over time and I see no reason to change them.

Artificial Reef

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evaluation his Department has made of the National Rivers Authority scheme to build an artificial reef off the shore off the north Norfolk coast; and what lessons he expects from the scheme proposals to be applicable to the remaining Norfolk and whole of Suffolk coastlines.

Mr. Curry: The National Rivers Authority's proposals to build an offshore reef to protect the Happisburgh to Winterton frontage of the north Norfolk coast are expected to be submitted to our engineers early in May. The Department has been kept fully informed of developments on the scheme as the NRA's consultants have progressed the design of the scheme, in the light of the knowledge generated by the east coast management study. Our normal technical appraisal of the proposals for grant purposes can be carried out only once the scheme has been received, so it is too early to reach any firm conclusions about the proposals, or to make an assessment of whether it would be possible to apply a similar approach to the remaining Norfolk and Suffolk coastline.

EMPLOYMENT

Ex-offenders (Training)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he is reconsidering the methods of funding to voluntary organisations to ensure the provision of sufficient special needs training for ex-offenders; and whether he intends to make more funds available for such training.

Mr. Jackson: I will write to the hon. Member with the information requested.

Clerical Work, London

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what estimate he has of the change in employment opportunities in the central London clerical field (a) over the past two years and (b) over the next two years.

Mr. Jackson: In January 1991, at jobcentres in inner London, there were 668 unfilled job vacancies in the clerical and machine operators occupational class. This compares with 2,943 in January 1989. The Department does not forecast vacancy figures.

Long-term Unemployment

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many long-term unemployed are registered in the Peterlee and Seaham areas; and what the numbers were year by year since 1987.

Mr. Jackson: The information is available in the Library, and is shown in the table which gives the number of claimants in the Peterlee and Seaham jobcentres areas who were unemployed for at least a year as at January 1987 and each subsequent January.

Date	Total
Peterlee jobcentre area
January 1987	1,454
January 1988	1,326
January 1989	892
January 1990	446
January 1991	331
Seaham jobcentre area
January 1987	1,000
January 1988	907
January 1989	758
January 1990	412
January 1991	331

Employment Training

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many trainees in employment training are (a) under 25 years and (b) in each five year age range between 26 and 65 years.

Mr. Jackson: Thirty-five per cent. of trainees in employment-training were under 25 years of age at 31 October 1990, the latest date for which data are available. The other information is not available in the form required, except at disproportionate cost.

Unemployed Claimants, London

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of unemployed claimants in (a) London Docklands, (b) the London borough of Newham, (c) the London borough of Southwark and (d) the London borough of Tower Hamlets in each year since 1981, as a percentage of unemployed claimants in Greater London.

Mr. Jackson: The information, available from June 1983, can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the House of Commons Library.

Training Schemes

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ensure that persons on Government training schemes will continue to enjoy the conditions applicable at the time of their embarking on the courses; and if he will take steps to restore the travel allowance to Mrs. P. Horsley of 9 Byron avenue, Southend on Sea, Essex for the final four weeks of her course at the Manor college, South Benfleet.

Mr. Jackson: The Essex training and enterprise council is responsible for Mrs. Horsley's training. Essex TEC is contractually obliged to ensure that employment training and youth training trainees already in training in its area immediately prior to the start of the financial year 1991-92 should remain in training, be offered an individual training plan identical, or closely similar to that formerly being pursued, and should be offered terms and conditions of training, remuneration and assistance towards support costs at least as good, item by item, as those previously available to those trainees. My officials are looking into Mrs. Horsley's situation in these terms, and I will write to my hon. Friend shortly when I have their findings.

Youth Employment

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people under 18 years there are in the borough of Blyth valley who are not employed and have not had a youth training opportunity offered to them.

Mr. Jackson: Blyth Valley is part of the area covered by the North Tyne training and enterprise council. The TEC has a clear contractual duty to ensure that every young person under 18 not in school or a job who is seeking YT entry should have the offer, and if necessary re-offers, of a suitable training place. No particular problems have been reported concerning the YT guarantee for young people in Blyth Valley. The TEC and the Employment Department are jointly committed to maintain the guarantee.

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what facilities he is making available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Jackson: The Department encourages all staff to contribute to a whole range of charities by means of payroll giving.

Regular reminders are issued to staff about this facility, but, in view of the large number of competing charities, it would be invidious to single out any particular case.

Open College

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what the Government have allocated to the Open college for each year since its establishment in (a) cash terms and (b) real terms, indexed so its first year equals 100; and what was spent in start-up costs for the Open college.

Mr. Jackson: The Government have provided pump priming funding to the Open college since its launch in September 1987 with the aim of improving the skills of the work force by making open learning opportunities more widely available. To date the college has received £26.9 million. No separate funding has been supplied to the college in respect of start up costs.

The allocations made to the college each year are as follows:

	Cash terms £ million	Real terms[1] £ million	Index
1986-87	2·0	2·0	100
1987-88	10·0	9·5	474
1988-89	5·7	5·0	252
1989-90	3·8	3·1	156
1990-91	5·4	4·2	209

Wages Councils

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will update his answers to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East, Official Report, 14 March 1990, columns 252-56 and 2 April 1990, columns 460-62, concerning wages councils.

Mr. Jackson: As the information requested is contained in a large number of tables, I will write to the hon. Member enclosing the information and place a copy of my reply in the Libraries.

Young Workers

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of the total annual wage bill for the latest available year in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany is accounted for by the local annual wage bill of those under the age of 18.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is not available.

Motor Components

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons are employed in the motor components industry in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany.

Mr. Jackson: Information on the motor components industry for France and Germany is not readily available.

Information at United Kingdom level is available only from the census of employment. At September 1989, the latest available date, there were 100,000 employees in the motor vehicle parts industry—activity heading 3530 of the standard industrial classification 1980. This covers the manufacture of motor vehicle parts made wholly or mainly of metal. Those engaged in the manufacture of other types of motor vehicle parts are classified elsewhere and are not separately available.

Wages

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many male and female workers earn non-adult rates in the Northern region and in each of the counties in the region.

Mr. Jackson: The information available from the New Earnings Survey is provided in the following table:

Numbers of employees in the NES sample, April 1990

		Total	Of which: on non-adult rate
			Number	Percentage of total
Northern region	Male	4,962	169	3·4
	Female	4,194	85	2·0
Tyne and Wear	Male	1,870	63	3·4
	Female	1,687	23	1·4
Cleveland	Male	867	34	3·9
	Female	704	20	2·8
Cumbria	Male	939	39	4·2
	Female	700	23	3·3
Durham	Male	888	23	2·6
	Female	733	12	1·6
Northumberland	Male	398	10	2·5
	Female	370	7	1·9

Note: Since the NES sample is mostly drawn from PAYE records, many of those with earnings below the income tax threshold are not covered. This may be expected to affect employees on non-adult rates more than other employees, and so the proportions in the sample who are in this category may not accurately reflect the proportions in the working population as a whole.

Labour Statistics

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his latest estimate of the number and proportion of families with four or more children where neither parent is in full-time paid work.

Mr. Jackson: It is not possible to distinguish between full-time and part-time paid work for the spouse of the head of the family unit. The answer relates to single and two-parent families with four or more children where neither parent has paid employment. Preliminary estimates from the GB Labour Force Survey for spring 1990 indicate that there were 76,000 such families, representing 28 per cent. of the total number of families with four or more dependent children.

Quarries

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many companies have been charged for failing to keep quarries safe in (a) Scotland and (b) England and Wales, in each year since 1985.

Mr. Jackson: Since 1985 in Scotland there has been one prosecution of a quarry company and two prosecutions of quarry owners, all in 1989. Since 1985 in England and Wales, one company was prosecuted in 1988; four in 1989 and one in 1990; two owners were prosecuted in 1989; and one manager in 1988.

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many quarries in Scotland were visited and inspected by Health and Safety Executive officials in each year since 1985.

Mr. Jackson: The information in the form requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, in 1989-90, Health and Safety Executive quarry inspectors made 870 inspection visits to quarrying activities in Scotland.

Wheal Jane Mine, Cornwall

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what development of tourism grants have been (a) applied for by and (b) granted to the Wheal Jane mine, Cornwall; and what was the amount of each application and grant.

Mr. Jackson: No applications for grant assistance have been received by the English tourist board, nor have any offers of assistance been made, in respect of the Wheal Jane mine.

Bishopton ROF

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on how many occasions British Aerospace have been prosecuted for safety offences at the former royal ordnance factory, Bishopton, Renfrewshire; and what was the result of each case.

Mr. Jackson: Royal Ordnance plc, Bishopton, a subsidiary of British Aerospace, has been prosecuted once for a breach of health and safety legislation since taking over the Royal Ordnance factory at Bishopton in 1985. The company pleaded guilty and was fined £1,600.

Quarries

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average time spent each year on quarry inspections by the Health and Safety Executive in Scotland; and what is the average time taken for each quarry inspection.

Mr. Jackson: Information is not available on the time spent each year on quarry inspections by the Health and Safety Executive before 1 April 1989.

However, between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990 HSE spent 2,543 hours inspecting all quarrying activities in Scotland. The average time taken for each quarry inspection in Scotland in 1989-90 was three hours.

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many officials are employed by the Health and Safety Executive in Scotland to visit and inspect quarries.

Mr. Jackson: On 1 April 1991 HSE employed one full-time quarries inspector in Scotland. However, other HSE staff, including factory and specialist inspectors and staff from the employment medical advisory service, may visit quarries to carry out investigations or surveys or for other reasons, as part of the planned programme of workplace visits of HSE's field operations division.

In addition, a senior inspector of quarries based in Newcastle-upon-Tyne has responsibilities for quarries in Scotland and will also make visits as necessary.

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will propose legislation to make it a criminal offence in Scotland to leave detonation cord and detonators on the surface land in and around a quarry without supervision.

Mr. Jackson: The Quarries (Explosives) Regulations 1988 already require quarry managers to ensure that explosives and detonators are kept securely. In particular the manager is required to ensure that at all times explosives and detonators are either in a locked explosives

NORTHERN IRELAND

Driving Offences

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress is being made towards introducing a penalty points system for offending drivers.

Mr. Needham: A first draft of a Road Traffic (Offenders) (Northern Ireland) Order to introduce a penalty points scheme has been prepared. The draft order will be finalised following the conclusion of discussions with the Northern Ireland court service and the RUC on the practical implications of the scheme. These discussions are at an advanced stage. It is hoped that formal consultation will take place over the summer months and that the draft order will be laid before Parliament by the end of 1991.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of BSE have been identified to date in 1991; what is the trend; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: There have been 50 confirmed BSE cases in Northern Ireland in 1991 to date. Incidence of the disease continues to increase and is expected to do so for some time until the ban on feeding of ruminant-derived protein takes effect.

Water

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland—what was the public response to the consultations document describing the options for development of a new source of water for the eastern part of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: There was considerable interest in the document from councils other Government Departments, public bodies, commercial concerns, various recreational, environmental and other interests, as well as individual members of the public.

Their comments were most useful and taking these into account, together with cost considerations, the Department of the Environment has decided to reduce the options to be examined in the environmental assessment to the following three:

(i) Abstraction from Lough Neagh at Hog Park Point, treatment at Hog Park Point, delivery to the existing Purdysburn service reservoir.

(ii) Abstraction from Lough Neagh at Hog Park Point, treatment at Forked Bridge, delivery to the existing Purdysburn service reservoir.

(iii) Impoundment of the Glenwhirry River, treatment adjacent to the dam, delivery to the existing Oldpark service reservoir.

The environmental assessment is expected to commence within the next three months.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Miscarriages of Justice

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, for each of the last four years, he will list the sums of money that have been paid by his Department as compensation on an ex-gratia basis where there has been misconduct or default by the police or some other agency of the criminal justice system other than cases involving wrongful imprisonment; and if for each such sum he will briefly summarise the circumstances.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Compensation on an ex-gratia basis where the police and probation services are concerned is a matter for the police authority or in the Metropolitan police district the receiver, or probation committee concerned.

Ex-gratia payments made in respect of the prison service cover a range of circumstances and the information requested could not be provided except at disproportionate cost.

Fox Hunts

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the number of people arrested in the past two years prior to the commencement of a fox hunt and then released without charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Operational policing is the responsibility of the chief officer concerned. I understand that the information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time asylum seekers have to wait for their application to be decided.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 4 March 1991 at column 10.

Fox Hunting

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the number of persons charged with offences arising from activities surrounding fox hunting in the past year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information on the number of people who are charged is not collected centrally. It is also not possible from information held centrally to identify the number of prosecutions for offences arising from activities surrounding fox hunting.

Fire Service

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he has given to privatising the fire service in England and Wales.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Government have no plans to change the public service basis on which the fire service is provided in this country.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action has been taken by the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority to implement recommendations 119 and 29 of the Fennell inquiry report on the London fire brigade.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: London fire and civil defence authority training deals with incidents at underground stations in firefighters' own and adjacent fireground territories. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 22 March at column 251 with regard to recommendation 119.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance has been promulgated by his Department to local fire authorities and brigades on the wearing and use of extended duration breathing apparatus by firefighters.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: None so far, since trials by a small number of brigades in the use of extended duration breathing apparatus are at an early stage.

Juvenile Offenders

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the level of criminal offences committed by juveniles who have absconded from local authority care; if such offences constitute a significant part of reported crime in relation to auto-crime and burglary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Information on the number of offences committed by juveniles who have absconded from local authority care is not collected centrally.

Probation Service

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what indicators or measures of performance are applied to probation service civil work; and what results have been obtained from such assessment.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: These are the responsibility of the management of local probation areas. Consideration is, however, being given to the establishment of national measures as part of the response to HM inspectorate of probation's recently completed thematic inspection of civil work.

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average weekly cost per case in the provision of family conciliation work by the probation service in England and Wales, including local and central costs, in the last year for which records are available.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Information on the costs of conciliation work is not held centrally.

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost to the probation service in England and Wales, including local and central costs, of family conciliation work in the last year for which records are available; and how many such cases were handled in that year by probation officers.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Information is not available separately for the cost of conciliation work. The number of conciliation cases on which the probation service began work in 1989 was 10,510—table 9.3 of "Probation Statistics England and Wales 1989".

Immigration (Iraqis)

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals to review the prohibitions imposed on Iraqi nationals under the immigration rules; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend has removed the prohibitions in the "Statement of Changes in the Immigration Rules" which was published on 12 April—Cm 1491. All applications by Iraqi nationals for visas, admission or extensions of stay now fall to be determined in accordance with the normal requirements of the rules.

Joan Harrison (Murder)

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ask for a report from the chief constable of Lancashire on the progress of the investigation into the murder of Joan Harrison who died on 23 November 1975; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The death of Joan Harrison has been the subject of a major investigation. A number of suspects have been interviewed, but no one has been arrested and charged; to date 2,320 statements have been taken. The case is reviewed regularly and any new information is fully investigated.

North Yorkshire Police

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many policemen there were in the North Yorkshire police in 1979 and the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: When the Government took office in May 1979 the strength of the North Yorkshire police was 1,337 officers. At the end of February 1991 this had increased to a strength of 1,383 officers. The force had 25 vacancies in February.

Immigration

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will list the countries the nationals of which currently need visas or entry clearance to enter the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The countries whose nationals require visas to enter the United Kingdom are listed in the appendix to the Immigration Rules—HC 356. Nationals of other countries, except European Community member states, require entry clearance to enter the United Kingdom for the following purposes:

(i) permit-free employment as a minister of religion, missionary or member of a religion; representative of an overseas newspaper, news agency or broadcasting organisation; or sole representative of an overseas firm;
(ii) as a businessman, self-employed person or person of independent means;
(iii) as a writer or artist;
(iv) as a dependant of a person in categories (i) to (iii) above or of a work permit holder;
(v) as the fiancé(e), spouse or other dependant of a person settled here.

Drink Driving

Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any new measures have recently been introduced to expedite the handling of drink driving cases.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am pleased that following discussions between representatives of the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Crown prosecution service and the Justices Clerks' Society, agreement has been reached on the way in which alleged offences of drink driving should be handled to ensure that they are dealt with as expeditiously as possible. The agreement, which is now in operation, provides that where an evidential breath test is in excess of the legal limit, and there is no subsequent blood or urine test, the person should be charged immediately rather than being released without charge and summoned at a later date. The agreement further provides that for cases where the documentation is complete and no further inquiries are required, the defendant should be bailed to appear at court seven days after his release from a police station. Where there are outstanding inquiries about documents, he should be bailed to attend court 14 days after release from the police station. Where inquiries are necessary for other driving offences, he should be bailed for 21 days. These procedures should ensure that most cases take no longer than 21 days from offence to the defendant's first court appearance at which we anticipate a substantial number of cases will be completed. The target days are of course without prejudice to any more expeditious handling which may be achieved locally. In some cases, where it is not the defendant's first drink driving offence he may well be brought to court within days so that the court can consider whether or not it is appropriate to impose a no driving condition on his bail. These arrangements represent a further significant step forward in dealing with drink drivers. Their operation will be reviewed in 12 months' time.

BBC2 (Reception)

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why television viewers in south-west Scotland cannot receive the Scottish regional programme broadcast on BBC2; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In order to receive television programmes, viewers in south-west Scotland depend upon the broadcasts from the main transmitter at Caldbeck in Cumbria which also services that area of England. When BBC2 offers regional programmes, the Caldbeck transmitter broadcasts the programmes appropriate to north-west England. As a result, viewers in south-west Scotland cannot see the programmes appropriate to their region on occasions and they therefore miss broadcasts of a number of significant programmes including major political, cultural and sporting events. To rectify this problem, the BBC has proposed adding a further channel to the output from Caldbeck as it has already done for BBC1.

We have given this matter very careful consideration. Frequency spectrum is a limited resource. The intensive use of this resource in order to bring four national programme services—soon to become five—to most of this country, means that in some areas, very few channels remain available. Technical studies indicate that, after taking account of the likely needs of Channel 5, only one more channel could be used at Caldbeck. We have a responsibility to ensure that this channel is used effectively in the public interest. Under the BBC proposal, the channel would most of the time broadcast the same programmes viewers already have available on BBC2 North West; Scottish regional programmes would only be broadcast for a few hours each week on average. Nevertheless' we recognise the importance of these programmes for viewers in south-west Scotland and we have therefore decided to allocate channel 67 to the BBC for this purpose. But in view of the consideration already outlined, we have to make two provisos. First, we shall need to keep the position under review. Once the current licensing round for Channel 3 has been finalised the independent television company serving south-west Scotland may be able to offer a wider use of channel 67 bringing significantly more choice to viewers in that area. We shall therefore look at the use which the BBC is making of this channel in 1993. If, at that point, we should decide to reallocate the frequency to Channel 3 it would be expected to compensate the BBC for the investment made in re-engineering the transmitters.

Secondly, the BBC's efforts to introduce the new service should not interfere with its programme of building new transmitters for these communities in other parts of the country who still have no television service at all.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list in the Official Report the total number of public sector housing tenants who where in receipt of (a) full housing benefit in 1989-90 and 1990-91 and (b) partial housing benefit in 1989-90 and 1990-91; and what estimate has been made of the numbers who will be recipients of (i) full and (ii) partial housing benefit in 1991-92.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the following table.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list in the Official Report the total amount of direct housing benefit subsidy made available to each district council in (a) 1989-90 and (b) 1990-91; and if he will give a projection of estimated direct housing benefit subsidy payable to each district council for 1991-92.

Industrial Deafness

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will introduce legislation to provide compensation for those people suffering loss of hearing from industrial processes, including the textile industry, and remove the limit of less than five years ago that the damage was inflicted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: From October 1974, occupational deafness was prescribed as an industrial disease in respect of a number of occupations. In 1979 the regulations were amended to include cover for processes in textile manufacturing and other occupations, and they were further extended in 1983.

We are currently evaluating the feasibility of the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council's recent recommendations on the administration and operation of provision for occupational deafness—Cm 1245. A response will be made shortly.

A time limit on claiming for industrial deafness has existed ever since the condition was first prescribed. There are no plans to change the five-year limit.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Holidays

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: To ask the Prime Minister if he will bring forward proposals to abolish the May day holiday in England and declare St. George's day a public holiday instead.

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so, though I recognise that this is a holiday that many people disapprove of.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 23 April.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his policy in relation to long-term coalition presence in the Gulf.

The Prime Minister: We have made it clear that it is for the states of the region to take the lead in establishing lasting security arrangements for the Gulf, We stand ready to play our part in underpinning such arrangements, if requested, but we have no intention of maintaining a permanent ground force presence in the Gulf.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to bring war charges against Iraqi leaders; and if he will make a statement on British policy on this issue.

The Prime Minister: Iraqi leaders bear personal responsibility under international law for their actions. This principle was reiterated in United Nations Security Council Resolution 674. In the case of both the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Genocide Convention of 1948, Iraqi leaders can, in law, be brought to trial before a national court or international tribunal. We and our EC partners have asked the United Nations Secretary-General to investigate how this might be achieved.

DEFENCE

Tornados

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce arrangements for the return to Britain of Tornado aircraft at present deployed to NATO bases in Germany; and if he will consider joint use by the RAF and the United States Air Force of facilities at RAF Lakenheath.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Local station announcements are to be made shortly on the reductions in the RAF Tornado force in Germany foreshadowed in the statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 25 July 1990. There are no plans for the joint use by the RAF and the United States Air Force of facilities at RAF Lakenheath.

The Gulf

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effects of the Gulf conflict on the procurement of equipment for the British Army.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are considering the outcome of the campaign and the conclusions to be drawn from it in this as in other areas.

Defence Estate

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will place in the Library a list of all sites on the United Kingdom defence estate in excess of 500 acres stating their location, name of establishment and county.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall do so shortly.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will place in the Library a list of the number of civilian employees at each of the sites on the United Kingdom defence estate in excess of 500 acres.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. The information requested is not held in this form. It could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Heckler and Koch

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment has been made of the effect of the purchase of Heckler and Koch by Royal Ordnance on the ability of the United Kingdom defence industrial base to meet the long-term requirements of the armed forces.

Mr. Alan Clark: We provided confidential advice on the proposed acquisition to the Office of Fair Trading in the usual way.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his German counterpart regarding the purchase of Heckler and Koch by Royal Ordnance.

Mr. Alan Clark: None.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the management of Royal Ordnance regarding their purchase of Heckler and Koch.

Mr. Alan Clark: None.

Defence Support Agency

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on defence support agency status for the service children's schools, north-west Europe.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Service Children's Schools (North West Europe), within the British Army of the Rhine, will be launched formally as a defence support agency of the Ministry of Defence on 24 April. The agency comprises 86 schools in Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands and Sardinia. It is currently staff by some 1,300 teachers and educational administrative staff, and 1,200 other full and part-time employees; for the financial year 1991-92 it has a projected operating budget of some £40 million cash and over £60 million full cost. The agency's chief executive, appointed through open competition from outside the civil service, is Mr. I. S. Mitchelson.

The role of Service Children's Schools (North West Europe) is to provide an efficient and effective education service, comparable to good local education authority practice, for the dependant children of MOD personnel in north-west Europe. It must respond not only to the changes in the size and disposition of British forces in Europe as the result of the changing political climate, the Gulf situation and "Options for Change", but also to the requirements of the Education Reform Act and current developments in the management of education.

I am confident that the chief executive and his staff will meet those challenges, and will maintain the high-quality educational service that SCS(NWE) has traditionally provided. As an agency, SCS(NWE) will have greater executive and managerial freedoms, and there will be increased opportunities for the chief executive to improve the efficiency and value for money of his organisation.

Accordingly, the chief executive has been set the following key targets for the first year of operation as an agency:

- in 1991-92, to maintain at least current rates of pupil success at GCSE and A-levels;
- by 1 April 1992, to develop and introduce systems which will provide a comprehensive measure of pupil performance, in terms of both examination results and other school activities; to formulate policies which aim for a progressive improvement in pupil performance; and to formulate work and activity programmes designed to make residence in NW Europe an educationally beneficial experience;
- by 1 April 1992, to develop appropriate measures of the level of qualification and training of teachers, and to set targets both for the match between teacher qualification and post and for the further training of teachers;
- to establish, by 1 September 1991, a two-year cycle of teacher appraisal;
- to plan and provide, by 1 April 1992, a co-ordinated support service both to voluntary groups catering for under-age school children and children with special educational needs;
- to develop, and introduce by 1 September 1991, a system for assessing parental satisfaction, and to seek progressive improvements in the level of parental satisfaction;
- to develop, and implement by 1 April 1992, processes both to allow parents to take a more active involvement in agency activities and to inform them of relevant educational developments;

to adhere to the statutory timetable for implementing the requirements of the Education Reform Act;

by 1 September 1991, to introduce improved management planning and information systems, including development plans for corporate services within the agency and school development plans; to keep within the agreed budget;

by 1 April 1992, to develop a financial information system which captures the full cost of agency activities; permits in-year forecast, monitoring and reporting of expenditure; and allows publication of accounts to Treasury requirements; to achieve continuing improvements in efficiency over the next five years by making, in 1991-92, cash releasing efficiency savings equivalent to 1 per cent. of cash costs, and by developing, by 1 April 1992, plans for achieving further efficiency improvements over the following four years;

by 1 April 1992, to develop and begin to implement plans for the restructuring of the agency and its services, in light of ministerial decisions on "Options for Change" and changes in the deployment of British forces in north-west Europe.

CIVIL SERVICE

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what facilities he is making available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Renton: The payroll giving to charity scheme operates in my Department, and, if they wish, staff may use this facility to contribute to the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

THE ARTS

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister for the Arts what facilities have been made available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Renton: The Office of Arts and Libraries has not been canvassed but staff may certainly use the payroll giving to charity scheme which is in operation—to contribute to the St. John Ambulance Brigade appeal.

Educational Theatre Companies

Mr. Wells: To ask the Minister for the Arts what guidelines the Government have given to the Arts Council on the priority to be given in the allocation of Government funds in respect of educational theatre companies.

Mr. Renton: The Arts Council's current three-year plan, which my Department has endorsed, specifically identifies the development of theatre for young people as a drama department objective.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Unquoted Companies (Employee Participation)

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many schemes have been approved by the Inland Revenue for profit sharing and share option schemes under the Finance Act 1988, sections 185-87 and schedules 9 and 10 for employees of unquoted companies; and how many such employees are covered.

Mr. Maude: Schemes approved by the Inland Revenue up to March 1991, under legislation now contained in the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, including 4,721 discretionary share option schemes and 1,934 all-employee share schemes. Of the latter, 962 were profit-sharing schemes and 972 were savings-related share options schemes. It is estimated that about 200,000 and 2·25 million individual employees had participated in these discretionary and all-employee schemes, respectively, up to the end of March 1990.

These schemes, many of which include several companies, relate to both quoted and unquoted companies. I regret that information about the numbers of unquoted companies and their eligible employees covered by these approved schemes could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many employee trusts established by unquoted companies the Inland Revenue have accepted as qualifying employee share ownership trusts under the Finance Act 1989, section 74 and Schedule 5; and how many employees are now potential beneficiaries under such trusts.

Mr. Maude: The Inland Revenue may not learn of the establishment of employee share ownership trusts as defined in the Finance Act 1989 until claims for tax relief are received. Such claims may be made up to two years after the end of the period of account in which the relevant company contributions are made. One trust established by an unquoted company has been accepted as a qualifying employee share ownership trust; it covers about 25 employees. Further trusts are likely to be accepted as qualifying shortly.

Gross Domestic Product Deflator

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the gross domestic product deflator, quarter by quarter, starting with the first quarter of 1978.

Winter Letting

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has received any representations from the holiday flat and self-catering industry concerning the restrictions on winter letting contained in section 50 of the Finance Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: I have not received any such representations.

The Gulf

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated cost, per capita, in respect of the recent Gulf dispute.

Mr. Mellor: The latest estimate for additional defence costs, spread over several years, is of the order of £45 per capita. However, I expect the bulk of costs to be covered by cash contributions generously pledged by other governments.

Income Tax

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the difference in tax revenue raised if the 75 per cent. of subcontractors paying schedule D tax, but providing labour only for hire, were on pay-as-you-earn instead.

Mr. Maude: This information is not available.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of total central Government revenue is raised by value added tax in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 22 April 1991]: Figures for tax revenues disaggregated by tax for the United Kingdom, France and Germany on a comparable basis are published in "Revenue Statistics of OECD Member Countries" which can be found in the Library.

Statistics

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing, for each quarter from the first quarter of 1979 to the first quarter of 1991, the annual percentage increase on the following indices: the retail prices index, the retail prices index excluding mortgage interest payments, the retail prices index excluding mortgage interest payments, rates and the community charge, the tax and prices index, the TPI excluding mortgage interest payments, the TPI excluding mortgage interest payments, rates and the community charge, producer output prices, the gross domestic product deflator, average earnings, whole economy, underlying, and the Institute for Fiscal Studies inflation index.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 22 April 1991]: The table gives the available information. The tax and price index is not available excluding mortgage interest payments or the community charge rates. I refer my right hon. Friend to the written answer I gave to him today for the gross domestic product deflator.

Mr. Mellor: The following countries have made or pledged cash contributions towards these costs:

[3] Received 2 April.

[4] A payment of $200 million made on 2 April. A further $800 million has been pledged.

[5] $30 million, subject to Korean Parliamentary approval.

[6] The sterling value of payments not yet received and denominated in US dollars will depend on the exchange rate prevailing at the time.

In addition, some 16 countries have provided assistance in kind.

Balance of Payments

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in descending order of balance of payment performance (a) cereals, (b) agricultural products as a whole, (c) agricultural products minus cereals, (d) oil, (e) chemicals, (f) iron and steel, (g) coal, coke, and so on, (h) motor vehicles, (i) electricals, (j) visibles and (k) invisibles for the years 1979, 1986 and the latest date available.

Mr. Maples: Figures for total trade are available on a balance of payments basis:

Local Government Finance

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what considerations of public policy and public finance follow from the decision that local authorities in exceeding their powers are not required to meet their banking commitments.

Mr. Mellor: The House of Lords has ruled that local authorities have no power to undertake interest rate swaps. The Government are studying the full implications of the judgment. The case raises a number of complex issues including the effect on local authorities and their charge payers as well as on banks.

ENVIRONMENT

London Zoo

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of payments made from central Government to all organisations associated with London Zoo since 1979.

Mr. Trippier: During this period central Government has paid grants worth about £31 million to the Zoological Society of London and the Institute of Zoology. This figure includes about £5·4 million for the institute's research work.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if any checks were made by his Department on the use of funds provided by Her Majesty's Government to London Zoo.

Mr. Trippier: During the period that the society was in receipt of revenue subsidy and contributions to capital investment, its finances and activities were closely monitored. The £10 million endowment in November 1988 was a once-for-all payment, and severed the financial relationship with my Department completely as well as the system of monitoring.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what conditions were attached to funds provided by Her Majesty's Government to London Zoo.

Mr. Trippier: The £10 million endowment in 1988 was given to the Zoological Society of London on the understanding that the society had established a subsidiary operating company with a strong management team to run the zoos; this management team had drawn up a master development plan for the zoos to secure their future, and with this endowment the Government's financial commitment to the zoos was at an end.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what financial requests have been received in the last three months from the London Zoo authorities; and what response has been made.

Mr. Trippier: Over the last few months I have discussed with the Zoological Society of London its general financial situation and have reminded it that the Government's financial commitment to its zoos ended in 1988.

House Prices

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing an index of house prices in real terms, for each quarter from the first quarter of 1979 to the latest available quarter.

Mr. Heseltine: The following index has been derived by deflating my Department's mix-adjusted dwelling price index by the retail prices index.

Hedgehogs

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if the export of live hedgehogs is governed by the CITES agreement; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many licences were issued for the export of live hedgehogs in 1990; and if he will make it his policy to discontinue the issuing of such licences.

Mr. Trippier: The export of the European hedgehog is not controlled by the provisions of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species; the controls that apply were set out in my earlier answer to the hon. Member of 25 February, at column 353.

No licences to export live hedgehogs were issued in 1990. All licence applications are treated on their own merits, following consultation with our scientific advisers, the joint nature conservation committee.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the level of Government grant in 1990-91 per head of relevant population in the London boroughs of Hackney, Newham, Redbridge and Waltham Forest.

Mr. Key: The information is as follows: Government grants in 1990-91, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, per head of relevant population are £1,415 in Hackney, £960 in Newham, £396 in Redbridge and £678 in Waltham Forest.

Benzene

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the maximum level of benzene permissible in petrol (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: Five per cent. by volume, in both cases.

Green Belt

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to permitting development on green belt sites in the East Thames corridor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Any proposals for development on green belt sites in the east Thames corridor are considered in the light of the planning criteria which apply everywhere in the green belt.

Irrigation, East Anglia

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many licences for extracting water from bore holes have been granted in each of the past two years to the horticultural industry in East Anglia; and what was the average amount of water permitted for extraction under each licence;

(2) whether he will make it his policy to conserve water in East Anglia by restricting the amount of water permitted for extraction by bore holes by the horticultural industry;

(3) what assessment he has made of the effect on water conservation by the horticultural industry in East Anglia of (a) limiting times of the day when water extraction is permitted, (b) limiting the total quantity of water permitted to be extracted by each user and (c) encouraging night-time use of water to reduce evaporation;

(4) what restrictions have been imposed by the National Rivers Authority on extraction of irrigation water from bore holes by horticultural undertakings in East Anglia;

(5) whether he will issue a direction to the National Rivers Authority to conserve water in East Anglia by restricting the amounts extracted by horticultural undertakings.

Mr. Baldry: These are all matters for the National Rivers Authority. The chairman will write to my hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to issue a direction to the National Rivers Authority.

Conifer Planting

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the outcome of the consultation exercise on the proposal to exempt parts of the industrial Pennines from the Government's general policy not to grant-aid predominantly conifer planting in the English uplands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Our consultation exercise last year gave rise to a large number of detailed responses and we have given careful consideration to these. Although there was support for some planting within the areas identified by the joint Department of the Environment-Forestry Commission working group, the general view was that the present policy adequately caters for the types and scale of new planting which will be appropriate and that the proposed exception would not be helpful. In recognition of this, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I have decided not to proceed with the proposal.

Local Authorities (Finance)

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the budgeted revenue expenditure and sources of income for local authorities in England, and their implication for community charge levels, in 1990-91 and 1991-92, before and after the enactment of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act 1991.

Mr. Portillo: Following the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act 1991, the average community charge actually paid in 1991-92, taking account of assistance received via income support, is estimated to be £172; charges will account for just less than 15 per cent. of authorities' revenue spending. The corresponding figures before the Act were £274 and 23·6 per cent. respectively; for 1990-91 they were £285 and 26·6 per cent. Full details are given in the table.

[4] Equated population is the equivalent number of personal charges which local authorities expect to receive from personal, standard and collective chargepayers.

Local Government Boundary Commission

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what will happen to the work of the Local Government Boundary Commission for England during the consultation period on the Government's proposals on local government.

Mr. Heseltine: We consider that the commission should continue with its current programme of work. Decisions on the implementations of their proposals can then be taken on the merits of those proposals and in the context of the wider proposals for change in local government.

Norwich City Council

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out details of the basis of calculation which has led him to require Norwich city council to limit its spending to £15 million in 1991-92, and set out the representations he has had asking him to impose this limit.

Mr. Key [holding answer 22 April 1991]: We have received a number of representations to cap excessive budgets. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has designated Norwich city council for capping because he considered that its budget was excessive on the basis of the principles which he has adopted for capping for 1991-92. The maximum budget or "cap" of £15 million proposed by my right hon. Friend represents his view of what is reasonable, achievable and appropriate in the light of the authority's particular circumstances, on the basis of all the information available to him.

Transport Privatisation

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what consultations his Department has had with local authorities over the proposed privatisation of municipal airports, ports and harbours and bus companies; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when the Government intend to bring forward proposals for the privatisation of municipal airports, ports and harbours and bus companies; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what representations he has received from private sector companies interested in bidding for the municipal airports, ports and harbours and bus companies that the Government intend to privatise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. and learned Friend is considering the scope for privatisation of local authority ports, airports, and public transport companies but has reached no conclusions. A company which is in negotiation with a local authority to take a lease of part of their port has been in touch with my Department; no other representations from prospective purchasers have been received.

Local Government

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the total number of local government staff in the following categories (a) education (lecturers and teachers), (b) education (others), (c) construction, (d) social services, (e) other general services and (f) police in the United Kingdom giving figures for (i) total number of staff and (ii) full-time equivalents for each of the years 1968, 1988 and 1990, or the latest date available showing the percentage increase/decrease in each case.

HEALTH

Ethnic Monitoring

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the department of psychological medicine of the City and Hackney health authority keeps records of the racial origins of in-patients and out-patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: A contact register is being developed for all patients receiving care from the department of psychological medicine at City and Hackney health authority. Patients are asked to identify their own ethnic origin. Where this is not possible, that particular section will be left blank. The register has a security mechanism whereby information relating to ethnic origin is kept confidential and can be checked by the patient on request.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to encourage social service departments to monitor girls from the relevant ethnic communities referred to in the answer to the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on 22 February, Official Report, columns 304-5.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 25 March at columns 322-24.

Staphylococcus Infection

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the closure of ward 3X at the Royal Liverpool University hospital, following contagion from multi-resistant staphylococcus; and how many other hospitals in the United Kingdom are affected by this bacterium.

Mr. Dorrell: A patient recently admitted to the hospital was found to be carrying the organism. Before this was identified, cross-infection occurred in two small units in the hospital. Conventional infection control methods, including the temporary closure of ward 3X, brought the outbreak under control. Ward 3X was reopened on Monday 22 April.

There are no national figures for the number of affected hospitals. Infection with multi-resistant staphylococcus —MRSA—is not among the diseases which are statutorily notifiable. However, a survey of the incidence of MRSA from 1986-90 is being prepared by the public health laboratory service and will be available shortly.

Cancer Services

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what matters are currently being considered by the advisory committee on cancer services; and when its next report is expected.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Standing Medical Advisory Committee, which advises my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, has a standing sub-committee on cancer which advises it on the prevention, diagnosis and treatment of cancer and, where relevant, on education. The sub-committee keeps all these topics under regular review. It has recently prepared a manual on quality assurance in radiotherapy.

Nurses' Pay

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the increase of pay in real terms for nurses in the employ of the health service since 1979.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Basic pay rates for nursing and midwifery staff and health visitors have increased by almost 45 per cent. on average in real terms since 1979.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 256, what reasons have been given by Dr. Nicolaides for the late notification to the chief medical officer of the abortion of the King's College baby, under ground 2, by selective reduction at 27½weeks gestation, notified to his Department on 11 April 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is not the Department's practice to disclose information provided in relation to individual cases of termination of pregnancy.

NHS Reforms

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how man copies of the March 1991 letter from the chief executive of the national health service about the 1 April national health service reforms have been distributed; and at what total cost.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The letter from the NHS chief executive marking the implementation of the NHS reforms on 1 April has been distributed to all 970,000 employees of the NHS in England. The cost of printing and distributing the letter to health authorities was £127,000.

Drug and Alcohol Addiction

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to extend drug and alcohol addiction advice centres.

Mr. Dorrell: The provision of local services to advise drug and alcohol misusers is a local responsibility. The Government's objective is to ensure that a comprehensive and integrated network of appropriate services is established to help these clients, and to this end has provided the following assistance to local agencies active in this field:

since 1986-87, regional health authorities have received additional allocations rising to nearly £16·5 million in 1991-92 for the expansion of services for drug misusers including HIV prevention aspects. This builds upon the network of local services set up by the central funding initiative which made available £17·5 million for 188 local drug projects between 1983 and 1989;

£4 million has been allocated to the national voluntary organisation Alcohol Concern for the three years starting in 1990-91, for disbursement to local voluntary organisations to support the improvement and expansion of alcohol advisory and counselling services; awards totalling £1·4 million have been made to local authorities under the alcohol and drugs specific grant introduced by the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. This grant will support expenditure of £2 million in 1991-92. The specific grant is available to local authorities to support voluntary sector organisations providing services for alcohol and drug misusers. This grant should help local authorities prepare for the new responsibilities placed upon them by the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990; grants are made to help meet the national headquarters expenses of Alcohol Concern, the Standing Conference on Drug Abuse and Turning Point, all of which support local agencies providing advice for alcohol and/or drug misusers.

Prestwich Hospital, Manchester

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the patients of Pinfold, Troy and Tottington wards at Prestwich hospital, Manchester, will be evacuated as advised by the health advisory service/social services inspectorate in its report dated October 1990 No. (90) M1/E.12.

Mr. Dorrell: I understand that Clifton house at Prestwich hospital, Manchester, will close by August 1991. Troy ward will close in May, Pinfold in June and Tottington in July.

The Gulf

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by each regional health authority the amount of money that was made available to meet the costs of receiving casualties from the Gulf dispute; and how much was actually spent by each regional health authority.

Mr. Dorrell Regional health authorities have incurred only minimal treatment costs, but did incur costs making preparations to treat casualties. Provisional cash limit adjustments were made at the end of 1990-91 based on regions' estimates of their expenditure and are given in the table. Adjustments cannot be finalised until the Department has received and validated final figures.

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what facilities he has made available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was informed of the "Over to you, John" appeal at a meeting with national representatives of St. John Ambulance in March, and wished it well. The Department would consider how best to involve its staff in the appeal on receipt of a formal request to participate.

Chemical Agents

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines his Department has given to doctors on defence against chemical agents.

Mr. Dorrell: Specific guidance on the treatment of patients affected by chemical agents was issued to the health service on 28 December 1990, in the context of the Gulf crisis. The same advice was also given to the national poisons information service to ensure a consistent response to inquiries from the health service. In addition various publications on the subject are available.

Dentists

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (i) how many dentists in each regional health authority had registered no adult or child patients under the new contract by the end of February;

(2) how many dentists for each regional health authority had registered adult or child patients under the new contract by the end of February in the ranges (a) less than 100, (b) between 101 and 500, (c) between 501 and 1,000 and (d) over 1,001;

(3) how many dentists had registered patients under 18 years of age only, in total and in respect of each regional health authority, as at the end of February.

Mr. Dorrell: Information is not available in the form requested. The table gives information regarding dentists' contracts, rather than individual dentists, as of 31 March 1991. Many dentists have more than one contract.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists had registered adults who were exempt from charges by the end of February.

Mr. Dorrell: The precise number of dentists who are accepting adults exempt from charges into continuing care arrangements under the new general dental services contract is not known. Recent information from family health services authorities suggests that the vast majority of dentists are doing so.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of estimates scheduled to dentists in respect of the categories (a) adults over 18 years and (b) children under 18 years for each of the five months from October 1990 to the end of February 1991.

Mr. Dorrell: Information is not available in the form requested. Most treatment of children is now covered by capitation fees paid to dentists, and is not claimed by submitting estimates. The table sets out the total number of claims for remuneration for item-of-service treatment of adults. It does not include claims for continuing care payments where no item-of-service treatment has been provided.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of estimates scheduled to dentists in respect of the categories (i) under the old contract, (a) adults and (b) children under 18 years and (ii) under the new contract (1) adults for registration only and excluding treatment, (2) adults with both registration and treatment, (3) adults for occasional treatment only, (4) children with entry payment claimed and (5) children with no entry payments claimed for each of the five months from October 1990 until the end of February 1991.

Mr. Dorrell: Information is not available in the form requested. The table gives information on estimates under the old contract and claims for remuneration under the new contract, for England and Wales. It is not possible to give separate figures relating to the following categories under the new contract: (i) claims for continuing care payments for adult patients where no treatment fees are claimed; and (ii) claims for occasional treatment.

NHS Internal Market

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether tertiary referrals will be treated in the same way as emergencies for the purpose of payment in the national health service internal market;

(2) what are the arrangements for paying for tertiary referrals.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Tertiary referrals will normally be paid for in the same way as referrals by a GP: district health authorities will contract directly with the units receiving tertiary referrals. The same arrangements as for other kinds of referrals will apply to emergency and non-emergency tertiary referrals not covered in advance by a contract.

Harrogate Hospitals

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many new beds have been provided in the Harrogate district and general hospitals since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to contact Mr. I. Lester, the chairman of the Harrogate health authority, for details.

Stillbirth

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 30 November 1990, Official Report, column 507, to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), what consideration has now been given to revising the definition of stillbirth.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 1 March at columns 632-33.

Wheelchair Patients

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that all doctors' surgeries and all doctors' consulting rooms are accessible to patients in wheelchairs, (a) in private sector surgeries and consulting rooms in London to which NHS patients are referred and (b) elsewhere.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 15 April 1991]: It is the Department's policy to ensure that facilities are accessible to patients in wheelchairs. Building regulations require reasonable provision to be made for the access of disabled people into and within buildings. These regulations are legally enforceable on both the National Health Service and the private sector. In 1989 the Department published "Health Building Note 40, Common Activity Spaces Volume 4—Designing for Disabled People", a copy of which is available in the Library. The building note gives guidance on designing health care facilities to meet the needs of disabled people. The Department is about to publish building guidance on general medical practice premises which includes specific recommendations on designing for wheelchair access.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Cricket Coaching

13. Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is considering further initiatives to promote the coaching of cricket in schools.

Mr. Atkins: I am very keen to encourage cricket in schools both within the curriculum and as part of extra-curricular sport. I am today holding a conference on "Sport and Young People" to which a wide range of physical education and sporting organisations have been invited. Many useful and interesting issues are being raised and I will be considering these further as part of my current review of sports policy.

Grammar Schools

14. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give consideration to an expansion of grammar school provision.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The organisation of school provision is a matter for individual local education authorities. I will consider any proposals by LEAs to reorganise schools, including proposals for introducing grammar schools, on their merits.

School Playing Fields

15. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department intends to carry out a survey of the availability of school playing fields; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The provision of school playing fields is the responsibility of LEAs and others in charge of the schools in the light of the standards in the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1981. However, the Sports Council will begin to draw up a register of playing fields during the course of this year. The register will include details of school playing fields.

Grant-maintained Schools

16. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he is considering regarding change of character of schools when approving grant-maintained status.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Schools may not propose a significant change of character in applying for GM status. Inevitably, however, they will wish in the course of time to assess whether their provision reflects local parent demand and changing circumstances. Where they decide to publish change of character proposals I will consider them and any objections on the merits of each case.

17. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schools in Shropshire have applied for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: Three. Shropshire has one grant-maintained school. A further two schools have submitted applications which will reach my right hon. and learned Friend for decision shortly.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the number of grant-maintained status schools he expects to be operating from 18 September 1991 and 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The future number of grant-maintained schools in operation cannot be accurately predicted, but there are more schools seeking grant-maintained status now than ever before. For example, there are currently 80 schools with grant-maintained ballots pending. This time last year there were seven. In the last three months alone, 48 schools have voted to seek grant-maintained status.

Reading

18. Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last received an Her Majesty's inspectorate report on the training of students in teacher training colleges in the methods of teaching reading; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: Ministers receive regular advice from Her Majesty's inspectorate on teacher training as on other aspects of the education system. Her Majesty's inspectorate will be providing advice to Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education in connection with the inquiry we have asked the council to conduct, and this will be included in their report at the end of the year.

21. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teaching of reading skills in schools.

Mr. Eggar: It must be a priority of every primary school to enable children to read. Advice on good practice was offered in the report on reading by Her Majesty's inspectorate which was circulated to all primary schools in January. The main message was that reading has to be taught, in a structured way, and the most effective teachers used a mix of methods to teach initial reading, invariably including phonics. School reading policies, well organised classrooms, good teaching and regular testing and recording were other important factors in fostering reading skills. The national curriculum for English provides an effective framework for the teaching and assessment of reading skills.

Swimming Lessons

19. Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about Derbyshire county council's proposals to cut swimming lessons in the county's schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations from pupils, parents and schools in Derbyshire about the effect of budget reductions on the education service in the county, including provision of swimming.

The education element of Derbyshire's standard spending assessment has risen by nearly 15 per cent. between 1990-91 and 1991-92. That is a substantial increase which should enable the authority to finance an education service of high quality if it manages its affairs well.

Education, South Cumbria

20. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received regarding higher and further education in south Cumbria.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no representations in recent months regarding higher and further education in south Cumbria.

Citizenship

22. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has reviewed the effectiveness of the teaching of citizenship within the curriculum.

Mr. Eggar: The National Curriculum Council issued guidance on education for citizenship last November. Her Majesty's inspectorate will report on the effectiveness of the teaching of citizenship to my right hon. and learned Friend in the course of their inspections.

Pupil Assessment

23. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statment on the introduction of pupil assessment in conjunction with the national curriculum in schools.

Mr. Eggar: The first national assessments of seven-year-olds in English, mathematics and science will take place this summer. The statutory arrangements for assessing seven-year-olds in other subjects at key stage 1 and for assessing other age groups will be phased in over the coming years.

Seven-year-olds (Testing)

24. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what decisions he has made about the publication of the tests of seven-year-olds this summer.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie).

Teachers (Career Changes)

25. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what provision exists for retraining and redeployment within the education service for teachers or lecturers who (a) wish or (b) are required through redundancy, to change careers.

Mr. Fallon: The deployment and redeployment of teachers are matters for individual LEAs and schools, as is responsibility for in-service training. The Department is providing substantial support through grants for education support and training for in-service training, including retraining to teach new phases and subjects.

Science and Engineering Research Council

26. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next proposes to meet the chairman of the Science and Engineering Research Council; and whether he proposes to discuss the funding of pay awards.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. and learned Friend meets the chairman of the Science and Engineering Research Council from time to time; he has no plans at present for a further meeting.

Sport

27. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on Saturday sport in schools.

Mr. Atkins: I am currently considering ways of encouraging more Saturday sport in schools, including greater partnerships between local sports clubs and schools. The Department is also revising its proposed guidance booklet on the community use of school sports facilities to reflect the recently identified need to amend section 42 of the Education (No. 2) Act 1986.

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what facilities he is making available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Eggar: None. Staff are encouraged to join the give-as-you-earn scheme which enables them to support the charity of their choice through regular deductions from salary.

Religious Education

Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects the National Curriculum Council to publish guidelines for the teaching of religious education in schools.

Mr. Eggar: There are no plans to issue guidance as to the content of individual agreed syllabuses for religious education. This is a matter for each local education authority to determine in the light of the statutory requirements. The National Curriculum Council has, however, a remit to advise at local request on the mechanics of constructing a syllabus taking account of the national curriculum approach of setting clear learning objectives through attainment targets and programmes of study. I understand that the National Curriculum Council is considering the issue of some collated advice of this nature for local education authorities. The timing would be a matter for the National Curriculum Council.

Graduate Teacher Training Registry

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will now publish the telephone numbers of his Department's graduate teacher training registry.

Mr. Fallon: The graduate teacher training registry is neither funded nor controlled by the Department of Education and Science.

Oil Fires

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on oil fire-related research in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Science and Engineering Council is currently supporting 17 projects concerned with the controlled combustion of oil, at a total cost of some £2 million. In addition, the Natural Environment Research Council is undertaking much work on atmospheric pollution, a significant percentage of which is on pollutants resulting from fossil fuel combustion and their effects on the environment.

Truancy

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent consultations he has had with local authorities about truancy from schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend, in conjunction with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, last week issued to local education authorities and others a consultative circular and draft regulations on school attendance. Consultees have been invited to comment on the proposals by 17 June.

Primary Schools (Administration)

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to reduce the burden of administration within primary schools.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend has already taken a number of steps to make the Government's reforms manageable for primary schools and to minimise paper work. We shall continue to look for opportunities further to reduce administration.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio, Harrogate

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the pupil-to-teacher ratio of Harrogate schools in 1979 and the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Fallon: Information on Harrogate schools is not available centrally. The pupil-teacher ratio for North Yorkshire local education authority, which includes Harrogate schools, was 19 in January 1979 and 17·3 in January 1990 the latest date for which figures are available.

School Inspections, Tower Hamlets

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place a copy of the recent Her Majesty's inspectorate report on Culloden primary school, Tower Hamlets, in the Library.

Mr. Fallon: Copies of all Her Majesty's inspectorate reports are sent to the Libraries of both Houses on the Friday of the week in which they are published. A copy of the report on Culloden school was sent on 19 April.

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science on which date he ordered Her Majesty's inspectorate to investigate standards of reading by pupils at Culloden primary school, Tower Hamlets; by what date the report was completed; on what date he first received the completed report; on what date the principal and chairman of governors at the school were first informed of the findings of the report (a) orally and (b) in writing; and on what date the media were first informed by his Department of the findings.

Mr. Fallon: On 6 March 1991, my right hon. and learned Friend asked the senior chief inspector—SCI—for information about the standards of reading in Culloden primary school, Tower Hamlets. Since no recent and relevant information was available the SCI took the decision to inspect the school.

The school was inspected on 18 to 22 March 1991. The report was completed on 10 April and my right hon. and learned Friend received it on the same day. It was printed on 12 April 1991.

The headteacher was informed orally of the findings of the inspection on the last day of the inspection as is customary. Copies of the report were sent to the headteacher and chairman of governors early on 16 April prior to its release to the press on the same day. HMI met the chairman and governors' body to discuss the report on the evening of 18 April 1991.

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will detail the extent of Her Majesty's inspectorate's investigation at Culloden school, Tower Hamlets, enumerating the number of Her Majesty's inspectorate visiting the school, the duration of the investigation and the total cost of the inquiries.

Mr. Fallon: Her Majesty's inspectorate inspected Culloden primary school in the week 18 to 22 March 1991. Five inspectors each spent four and a half days in the school and were joined for one and a half days by one other inspector. The total cost of the inspection was £5,760. In addition to the actual inspection, HMI made preliminary visits, attended meetings of the governing body and were involved in preparing and writing the report. The total cost was, therefore, approximately £7,680.

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide details of all Her Majesty's inspectorate inspections of primary and secondary schools in Tower Hamlets since 1 April 1990, and a list of all subsequent reports that have been published.

Mr. Fallon: During the year in question, 23 inspection visits have been made to primary schools in Tower Hamlets and three to secondary schools; a further three were visited in February 1990. Three special schools were also visited. Although there was feedback to the schools in question during the visits themselves, none of the inspection visits to secondary or special schools were reporting inspections. Consequently they did not lead to published reports. The report on one of those inspection visits to primary schools, Culloden, was published on 16 April 1991. Since 1 April 1990 a report has also been published on Hague primary school, which was inspected prior to that date.

London Hospital Schools

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received in respect of the Hospital Schools in London Bill.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend has received letters from three London hospitals about the Hospital Schools in London Bill.

WALES

Education (Science Teachers)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the percentage of qualified science teachers in each county who teach in each of the years in (i) the primary schools of Wales and (ii) the high schools of Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I shall write to the hon. Member and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his Department's responsibility regarding animal welfare in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: High standards of farm animal welfare on farms, during transport, at markets and at the place of slaughter are matters of major importance. The Government are committed to promoting the maintenance and improvement of farm animal welfare standards, and have taken many positive measures in this regard.

Pharmacists (Advice)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the written advice of his Department to retail pharmacists regarding the methods of disposal for unwanted medicines and poisons returned to them by their customers.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain gives advice to community pharmacists on the disposal of returned medicines. The Department has not issued any written advice in addition to this.

DUMP Campaign

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what level of funding his Department has deemed appropriate for the financing of the Welsh Pharmaceutical Committee disposal of unwanted medicines and poisons (DUMP) campaign, during the autumn of 1991.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department will be providing approximately £28,000 in respect of contractor costs for the all-Wales DUMP campaign proposed for the autumn of 1991.

Teachers (Qualifications)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the qualifications of teachers in Wales who take classes in the physical sciences.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am pleased that the latest secondary school staffing survey showed that, taken together, about 95 per cent. of teachers teaching biology, chemistry and physics at GCSE level have a qualification in that subject or in a related science subject. At A-level, at least 95 per cent. have a qualification in the science subject they teach.

I wish to see an improvement and that is why we have widened the scope of the shortage subject bursary scheme to include all sciences and thus attract more science teachers into the profession.

Probation Teachers

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the teaching force in each of the local education authorities in Wales are probationers.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information requested, based at September 1990, is as follows:

Percentage of the teaching force who are qualified and on probation

	Primary	Secondary
Clwyd	2·6	2·3
Dyfed	4·4	2·5
Gwent	2·9	2·3
Gwynedd	2·7	2·5
Mid Glamorgan	2·2	2·5
Powys	2·7	1·6
South Glamorgan	8·0	3·4
West Glamorgan	2·7	1·4
WALES	3·6	2·4

Science Teaching

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of non-specialist supply teachers or people with no training in the national curriculum, who take science lessons in (a) the primary schools and (b) the high schools of Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: No reliable information is available.

Broadcasting in Wales

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his role and functions regarding broadcasting in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Broadcasting is the statutory responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. We liaise closely with the Home Secretary on the particularly Welsh features of broadcasting policy. We also advise the Home Secretary on broadcasting appointments related to Wales.

Pupil Assessment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he will take to assist (a) head teachers and (b) teachers who must assess pupils under the national curriculum.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Government have made available considerable assistance to support head teachers and teachers in Wales in preparation for this year's first statutory assessment of seven-year-olds. This includes:

- approval of specific grant aided expenditure up to £2·3 million in 1991-92 for training and in support of administrative arrangements;
- an extra day's school closure specifically for primary school teachers involved in the assessment of seven-year-olds;
- a computer-based system, developed jointly with LEAs, to cut down the burden of teachers in calculating the detailed assessment results;
- comprehensive guidance material and training seminars provided through the School Examination and Assessment Council and LEAs.

North Wales Expressway

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects the north Wales expressway Conwy tunnel to open; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The A55 Conwy crossing scheme is expected to be opened in the autumn of this year as indicated in the 1991 supplement to "Roads in Wales".

Chester-Bangor Expressway

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects the Chester-Bangor expressway to be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Fifty-one of the 60 miles of the A55 between Chester and Bangor are already dualled and open to traffic; eight miles are under construction. Work on the final section, the Aber improvement scheme, is planned to start before April 1994 and to take about 18 months.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cattle in Wales were confirmed to have had BSE last year (a) under the age of five years and (b) over the age of five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The number of cattle in Wales confirmed in 1990 to have had BSE is as folows:

	Number
(a) Cattle with an age at onset of up to and including five years	574
(b) Cattle with an age at onset of greater than five years	433
(c) Cattle for whom the age at onset is unknown	37

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis for the years 1966-67 to 1990-91, otherwise identical in format to table 1.1 of "Welsh Local Government Financial Statistics No. 14", 1990, of rate fund services revenue account but which also distinguishes (a) non-domestic rate revenue from domestic rate revenue and (b) gross rates, net rates and rate rebate grant.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 28 March 1991]: The historical tables referred to are available in Welsh Local Government Financial Statistics (in table 1) for each year since 1975-76. The additional information requested, where available, is shown in the following table.

Thus figures from 1983-84 are not strictly comparable with those for previous years.

Listed Buildings

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many grade 2 listed buildings have been demolished in Gwent and the Glamorgan counties in the last three years; and what information is held on the circumstances of such demolitions.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 22 April 1991]: Before a listed building can be lawfully demolished listed building consent must be obtained. Local planning authorities consider such applications against the detailed guidance issued by my Department. This is contained in Welsh Office circular 61/81, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. Where a local authority is minded to grant consent for demolition the papers must be referred to my Department for the case to be examined. In the past three years, in line with this process, two grade II listed buildings have been demolished in Gwent and the three Glamorgan counties with the benefit of listed building consent. In addition, my Department is aware of the demolition of a further grade II structure. An application for retrospective consent for this case is being considered.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Antarctica

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the progress of international negotiations towards achieving a consensus on the regulation of Antarctic mineral resource activities.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The second session of the XIth special consultative meeting of Antarctic treaty parties began in Madrid on 22 April.

Discussion on mineral activities and environmental protection in Antarctica will be taken forward at this meeting and we hope a consensus can be reached.

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what facilities he is making available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Garel-Jones: This Department has received no official approach about this appeal. No special facilities have therefore been offered, but there would be no objection to officers making collections on their own initiative.

Cyprus

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the number of non-Cypriots now living in (a) northern Turkish Cyprus and (b) southern Greek Cyprus.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We do not have reliable information on the number of non-Cypriots in Cyprus.

China

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has made any representations to the Chinese Government about the denial to local people of the right to attend masses said by foreign priests at the chapel and tomb of St. Francis Xavier on Sancian island; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: No.

Thailand

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to make United Kingdom attendance at the World bank annual meeting in Bangkok, later in the current year, conditional on the setting of a timetable for elections and a return to democracy in Thailand.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The site of the World bank's annual meeting is chosen by the membership as a whole some years in advance. We have expressed our regret at the overthrow of the democratically elected government in Thailand and our hope for the speedy restoration of democracy. However, the provisional constitution announced on 1 March has set a timetable for elections and a return to democracy.

Kurds and Shias

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, in his efforts to provide the Kurds and Shias in Iraq with safe havens, he will approach the International Committee of the Red Cross and other signatories of the four international conventions of 1949, to which Iraq is a signatory, to bring these conventions, including the creation of protected neutral and safety zones as set out in the Red Cross conventions, Draper 1958, into operation.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The provisions of the fourth Geneva convention, such as article 15 which provides for the setting up of neutralised zones in regions where fighting is taking place, are applicable only to international conflicts. During non-international armed conflict, article 3 of the fourth Geneva convention sets out the minimum humanitarian standards which are to be applied.

The ICRC is, of course, providing humanitarian assistance to those in need in Iraq. We fully support its efforts in this respect.

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he intends to take any initiative in association with the International Committee of the Red Cross and other signatories of the four international conventions of 1949 in respect of grave breaches, referred to in section 1 of the Geneva Conventions Act 1957, such as those against Kurds and Shias, including the convention relating to civilians in Iraq.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Individual Iraqis bear personal responsibility under international law for any grave breaches of the Geneva conventions they order or commit. This principle is reiterated in United Nations Security Council resolution 674.

We are already in regular contact with coalition allies in connection with the collation of evidence which might support criminal charges against Iraqis or others who are in their custody as a result of the conflict. We understand that the Kuwaiti authorities intend to start such trials in the near future.

Sudan

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there are any proposals to create a safe haven for the Christian peoples of south Sudan.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no such plans. Our efforts are directed instead towards averting the impending famine in Sudan through the despatch of substantial amounts of humanitarian aid and to urging on both sides in the long-running civil war the need to settle their differences. We wish to see all religious communities in Sudan play a full part in the country's affairs. This would involve the Government of Sudan providing adequate safeguards for Christians living in the south of the country.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment was made of the effect of calls for insurrection by radio stations on (a) the Kurds and (b) the Shias during February and March.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Following the end of the Gulf conflict those oppressed by Saddam Hussein in the Kurdish north and the Shia south of Iraq decided to rise up against the Iraqi regime. Those concerned took this decision for themselves.

Border Controls

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will place in the Library an English language translation of the Schengen agreement.

Mr. Garel Jones: The United Kingdom is not a party to the Schengen agreement, but we have asked the Schengen secretariat whether copies may be transmitted to the parliaments of non-signatories.

Bahurutshi Tribespeople

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will urge the President of South Africa as a matter of urgency to aid the Bahurutshi tribespeople who were displaced from their homes in Braklaagte on 8 January.

Mrs. Chalker: We have raised the problems facing dispossessed communities with the South African authorities on a number of occasions. Staff from our embassy have visited the Braklaagte area to see the situation for themselves.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Iraq

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when and how he was consulted by the US office of foreign assets control before it issued its list of specially designated nationals of Iraq on 1 April.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer to the answer my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) on 15 April 1991, Official Report, columns 30-31.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what recent inquiries he has undertaken to enable him to decide whether the claim made on 1 April by the United States Government that Sollatek UK Ltd. is acting or purporting to act directly or indirectly on behalf of the Government of Iraq is correct; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information he supplied to the US office of foreign assets control about Sollatek UK Ltd. following the meeting between his officials and that company on 9 April;

(3) what recent inquiries he has undertaken to enable him to decide whether the claim made on 1 April by the United States Government that Sollatek UK Ltd. is owned or controlled by Iraqis is correct; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what information he supplied to the US office of foreign assets control about Sollatek UK Ltd. prior to 1 April;

(5) what evidence he was supplied with by the US office of foreign assets control when it consulted him about its plans to include Sollatek UK Ltd. in its list of specially designated nationals of Iraq.

Mr. Sainsbury: DTI officials met representatives of Sollatek on 9 April. The company provided my officials with commercially confidential information which, with Sollatek's permission has been passed to our embassy in Washington to use when making representations to the US Department of the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control, DTOFA. No other information has been supplied to the US DTOFA prior to this.

Kuwait Oil Field Fires

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if British equipment and personnel are available to assist the extinquishing of oil field fires in Kuwait; how much has been accepted by the Kuwait Government; and what action he is taking to encourage British firms to offer such assistance of Kuwait.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 18 April 1991]: A number of British companies has put forward proposals to the Kuwait Oil Company for assistance in extinguishing oil field fires. The Prime Minister wrote to the Crown Prince on 27 March offering the services of a consortium of British companies and the fire services, and I was able to discuss these proposals with the Crown Prince, the Minister for Oil and the chairman of the Kuwait Oil Company during my visit to Kuwait on 9-10 April. I hope the Kuwaitis will soon be in a position to respond positively.

Tourism

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what level of support he has given to the tourist industry for the Northumbrian region in each of the last five years.

Mr. Jackson: I have been asked to reply.

The English tourist board, which is grant-aided by my Department, has made the following subventions to the Northumbria tourist board in the past five financial years:

TRANSPORT

MV Pescado

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the circumstances in which the Pescado, whose wreckage was found on 8 March was lost; whether that vessel was previously involved in any incident since 1980; and if he will set up a public inquiry into the incident.

Mr. McLoughlin: The loss of MV Pescado is the subject of a full inspectors' inquiry, which is at present in progress. The circumstances of the loss are, at the moment, still unclear. To the inspectors' knowledge, the only previous incidents concerning this vessel were two injuries sustained by crew members while fishing. With the inquiry in hand it would be wrong for me to make any further statement at this stage.

When the inquiry is complete, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will consider, in the light of its conclusions, whether a public inquiry should be ordered. If he decides against this, the report of the chief inspector of marine accidents will be published. This will be based on that of the inspectors' inquiry and will include the inspectors' findings in full.

Marine Accident Investigation Unit

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the staffing levels in the marine accident investigation unit for each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The hon. Lady will, of course, be aware that the marine accident investigation branch was set up by Parliament two years ago. Therefore, I am unable to answer the question as submitted.

When the marine accident investigation branch was set up, the initial staff level was set at 15, and this was achieved by February 1990. The present level has increased to 21.

Unadopted Roads

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to reform the legislation on unadopted roads.

Mr. Chope: None, at present. Following a review in 1983, it was decided that the basic principles of private street works law should remain unchanged.

M11

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all those who made representations to him and his Department in relation to Mallards Plot 815 along the route of the M11 link road.

Mr. Chope: Forest housing association made representations prior to the 1989-90 public inquiry; the Bushberry road and Benn street residents association has raised the matter following the decision of 26 March.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has assessed whether the common land at Quartermile lane, next to Hackney marshes, which it proposes to take for the M11 link road, is capable of use for sporting and recreational purposes; whether the proposed exchange strip of land in front of the new Spitalfields development is capable; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Land in front of the new Spitalfields site is being offered in exchange for a length of roadside verge on Quartermile lane; plot 15 in the draft compulsory purchase Order. The exchange land and plot 15 could accommodate comparable recreational activities. The majority of the existing common land at Quartermile lane will not be required by the scheme proposals, but for those other areas which are to be taken, exchange land will be given elsewhere.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make available to the hon. Member for Leyton his Department's M11 link road construction drawings of the Lea bridge interchange, giving an indication of where they differ from the plans his Department placed before the recent public inquiry.

Mr. Chope: The construction drawings are not yet available. They will be drawn at a larger scale than the order plans and with appropriate detail.

Road Building

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment is made by his Department of the quality of land, to replace other land required for road building, for its environmental benefit to the local community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Land is required to be given in exchange only for open space, common or allotment land. My Department assesses potential exchange land against the statutory criteria. The land must be not less in area and equally advantageous. Area, condition, location and use are taken into account. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment decides whether the land is suitable only after consideration of any representations and objections in response to his advertisement of the proposal.

Road Casualties

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how and when he expects to respond to, or comment on, the European Commission report by experts on the ways to reduce road casualties.

Mr. Chope: The report to the European Commission by the Committee chaired by Monsieur Gerondeau was published by the Commission on 19 February. I welcome the report as providing the basis for the development of a Community strategy for road safety from which to identify priorities for Community action to reduce casualties. Following our representations, the report is to be considered at the June Transport Council.

Exxon Valdez

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration has been given to the reports and recommendations of the several inquiries into the Exxon Valdez disaster in Alaska on 24 March 1989 with a view to ascertaining any lessons relevant to the protection of the marine and coastal environment around British waters; and whether Her Majesty's Government propose any practical measures or improvements to environmental control procedures in the light of such reports and recommendations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The US national transportation safety board marine accident report on the Exxon Valdez oil pollution disaster has made a number of recommendations. Many deal with local conditions and operations, but others, in particular those covering double bottoms and oil spill response, are actively being considered by the International Maritime Organisation: fatigue, manning, drug and alcohol abuse were issues already under consideration at IMO. The Department is participating and contributing to these international activities and will support such measures and improvements to international regulations which are seen to be beneficial and practicable.

On the domestic front, contingency arrangements to deal with pollution at sea in United Kingdom waters are kept under constant review by the Department's marine pollution control unit.

A thorough examination covering United Kingdom counter pollution responsibilities, communications and resources was carried out following the Exxon Valdez incident. The result, as I announced in the House on 6 March last year, is that the capability of the MPCU to deal with major oil spills has been increased by doubling its contracted dispersant spraying capacity by the use of larger aircraft. The MPCU's ability to detect oil slicks at sea has also been doubled by increasing to two its complement of remote sensing aircraft, which are used to control and direct counter pollution operations. Additionally, this enhanced remote sensing capability has been used to increase by 60 per cent. regular aerial surveillance patrols of United Kingdom waters to deter and detect ships making illegal operational discharges of oil.

Emergency Services

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what rescue equipment, communications equipment and vehicles he plans to make standard issue for the new limited response teams; and what steps he will take to encourage greater use of private vehicles on coastguard duties.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The concept of initial response teams along with their number, location, and equipment requirements necessary to meet the recommendations of the review is still being discussed and assessed. As far as the vehicular requirements of individual teams are concerned the use of private vehicles will be considered where this would provide the most suitable and cost-effective method of meeting the response criteria recommended in the review.

Coastguard Review (Humber)

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions have been held between senior management and local interests in the Humber district of the coastguard review.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 15 April 1991]: Following my announcement of the coastguard review, the district controller at Humber maritime rescue sub centre made a direct approach to all interested local authorities in his district advising them of the review and inviting written comments. Subsequently, most of these bodies replied. I am satisfied that all local interests have had the opportunity to comment and their views are being taken into account in the draft proposals to implement the recommendations of the review.

Coastguard Service (Annual Budgets)

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the annual budget for the coastguard service for each of the past five years in cash and real terms; and what proportion of that budget is spent on the auxiliary service.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 15 April 1991]: The figures requested are as follows:

Actual cash costs	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91
Total Her Majesty's Coastguard costs	21,762	23,990	25,853	28,584	29,630
Auxiliary Coastguard pay, allowances and equipment	1,956	2,069	[1]2,732	2,078	2,007

[1] Costs include two years spend on vehicles and boats.

Vehicle Emissions

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what instructions he has given to his regional traffic area offices with regard to complaints from the public about smoky vehicles; how many such complaints have been received since the publication of the leaflet "Wake up to what you can do for the Environment"; and what action has been taken, or is planned, in respect of such complaints.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 April 1991]: If a complaint is about a smoky vehicle subject to operator licensing, which means most buses and lorries and sufficient details of the vehicle and the incident are provided, the Department will write to the operator. The letter will ask him to have the vehicle checked and to report to the Department, within 10 days of the date of the letter, on the action taken. The letter will also warn that excessive smoke emission is an offence under regulation 61 of the Construction and Use Regulations. As these arrangements have only recently come into force, it is too soon to estimate their impact on numbers of complaints.

Goole Railway Bridge

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the names of pilotage companies which, over the last 10 years, or the nearest practicable equivalent time span, have been licensed, or otherwise authorised or entitled, to pilot river craft on the Rivers Humber and Ouse up to the point near Goole railway bridge where pilotage ceases to be compulsory.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 22 April 1991]: Associated British Ports has been responsible for pilotage services in this area both as competent harbour authority since 1 October 1988 under the Pilotage Act 1987 and prior to that as pilotage authority for the district under previous pilotage legislation. Only those pilots authorised by Associated British Ports may act as authorised pilots in this area.

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the occasions over the last 10 years, or the nearest practicable equivalent time span, on which Goole railway bridge over the River Ouse has been struck in collision by river craft to the extent of causing appreciable bridge damage; and on how many such occasions the bridge has had to be closed to rail traffic.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 22 April 1991]: Since 1981, collisions causing appreciable damage to the bridge structure or its protective fenders and piles have occurred on the following dates:

Year
1981	24 February
1984	26 August
1985	20 January
	29 November
1986	30 May
	13 June
1987	27 April
	23 October
1988	12 September
	6 November
	21 November
	23 November
	5 December
1989	28 April
	16 October
1990	29 January
	20 April
	22 August
	30 August
	12 September
	3 October
	5 October

After any collision involving the main bridge structure, rail traffic is stopped until an examination is completed by BR's area engineer. The incident on 23 November 1988 was the only one to cause an extended closure of the line.

Public Transport (Environmental Impact)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what weight is given in cost-benefit analyses to environmental criteria in assessing road and rail schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 15 April 1991]: In reaching a decision on a particular transport infrastructure scheme, we take great care to ensure that full weight is given to the environmental as well as the economic consequences. Where a scheme may give rise to significant environmental effects, an environmental assessment is prepared and the impacts quantified, where practical. The full range of evidence on economic, environmental and other effects is gathered to inform decision making, whether or not it can be quantified or expressed in monetary values.

EMPLOYMENT

Social Affairs Council

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which other European community countries supported the United Kingdom's position on Commission proposals at the Social Affairs Council meeting on 26 November 1990.

Mr. Howard: At the Social Affairs Council on 26 November, the Council unanimously adopted the health and safety directive on biological agents and similarly agreed a common position on a directive to control the use of asbestos in the work place. There was also unanimous agreement on an action programme in favour of the elderly and on a resolution on the comparability of vocational training qualifications.

A large majority of delegations agreed with the United Kingdom that rapid progress could be made towards agreeing the proposed directive on the health and safety of temporary workers. A majority of member states including the United Kingdom had significant difficulties with the substance and proposed treaty base of the Commission's proposals for directives concerning the employment of part-time and temporary workers. A minority of other member states also had difficulties with proposals to amend the regulations concerning free movement of labour and social security entitlements for migrant workers; and it was agreed that the proposals should be remitted for further consideration by officials.

Employment Training

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed people there are outside the guarantee and aim groups on employment training.

Mr. Jackson: A total of 62 per cent. of people on employment training were outside the aim and guarantee groups, as at October 1990, the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the number of employment training schemes that will be required to close as a result of cuts in the training budgets for training and enterprise councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The awarding of contracts for the provision of employment training is now the responsibility of training and enterprise councils in England and Wales, and local enterprise companies in Scotland. The Employment Department does not keep figures on the withdrawal or participation of training providers in employment training.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he is proposing any new initiative for training provision for special needs groups; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Local enterprise companies in Scotland and training and enterprise councils in England and Wales have been given the responsibility and flexibility to innovate and arrange the delivery of training to meet the varying needs of unemployed people in their area. I have no plans to set up any new initiatives for training provision for special needs groups.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what current steps he is taking to pursue the objective set out in "Training and Employment" of attracting returners to the labour market.

Mr. Jackson: Local enterprise companies in Scotland and training and enterprise councils in England and Wales have a contractual requirement to ensure equality of opportunity in all their activities. Returners to the labour market may enter employment training without being registered as unemployed, providing they have been out of employment for at least two years for domestic reasons. The framework within which local enterprise companies and training and enterprise councils operate gives them the flexibility to tailor their training with their domestic commitments—for example, with part-time participation —the use of distance learning material and support with childcare costs.

Periods of Unemployment

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on the average lengths of time that individuals are unemployed; and whether this varies as between different levels of income before and after the period of unemployment.

Mr. Jackson: In January 1991, the latest date for which information is available, the median duration of unemployment in the United Kingdom was 21·7 weeks. Information relating to income is not available.

Training Schemes

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what recent changes and reforms he has made in respect of Government training schemes; what is the financial impact of the changes; and what is the basic purpose of these changes.

Mr. Jackson: The most important recent change is that responsibility for planning and delivering training programmes at a local level has been given to the new employer-led training and enterprise councils. TECs have considerable flexibility, within a national framework set by Government, to tailor their training to meet local needs, and to evolve innovative approaches to developing skills and supporting business growth. Other significant changes include:

- Training credits, which are being piloting by 10 TECs, and one local enterprise company in Scotland. This initiative will expand and improve training for young people by giving them the power to choose and buy training to approved standards;
- the development of youth training, which assists young people to achieve nationally recognised vocational qualifications;
- the investors in people initiative, designed to encourage employers to improve performance through effective development to their people;
- education business partnerships, which are joint ventures between TECS and local education authorities involving employers, educationalists and others in the local community.

The creation of TECs and the flexibilities they have will ensure that programmes are more effective and responsive to both business and individuals. This will in turn lead to improved value for money. The purpose of these changes is to help ensure that our economy has the skills it needs.

Kilbarchan Quarry

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many times in the past 12 months the quarry in Kilbarchan, Renfrewshire, has been examined by health and safety inspectors.

Mr. Jackson: The Health and Safety Executive's quarries inspectorate has carried out two inspections at Kilbarchan quarry, Renfrewshire, during the past 12 months.

Employment Office Closures

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what guidelines he has issued to the Employment Service Executive Agency in connection with the closure of employment offices in the Yorkshire and Humberside region.

Mr. Jackson: The employment service's roles and responsibilities for the management of its estate are outlined in section 6 of the agency framework document, a copy of which is held in the House of Commons Library. When considering the closure of an office, account will be taken of the comprehensiveness of the service available in the office concerned, business volumes, accessibility to other offices and whether resources are being best used.

Strikes, Yorkshire

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many days were lost through strikes in Yorkshire in each of the past 12 years.

Mr. Jackson: Industrial disputes data are only available by standard region. The data for Yorkshire and Humberside are given below:

Year	Working days lost (thousands)
1990[1]	89
1989	325
1988	244
1987	339
1986	250
1985	2,076

1983	415

SCOTLAND

Enterprise Initiative

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what evaluation he has undertaken of the enterprise initiative in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The enterprise initiative is a national initiative. Consequently, all evaluations of it have been undertaken by the Department of Trade and Industry on a United Kingdom basis, taking account of, but not evaluating separately, Scottish participation.

The following evaluations have been published and copies are available in the Libraries of the House:

Fishing Vessels (Callings)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of reported callings by fishing vessels for each month from, and including, January into the ports of Scrabster, Stornoway, Ullapool, Aberdeen and Shetland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: United Kingdom fishing vessels intending to cross the 4° west line of longitude to the north of the Scottish mainland are required to contact a designated office of the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department. The designated offices were Ullapool, 1 January to 4 March 1991, and Peterhead, 5 March to date. The number of calls received at these offices were as follows:

	January	February	March	April (1 to 15)
Ullapool	47	100	19	—
Peterhead	—	—	190	69

No calls were made to Scrabster, Stornoway, Aberdeen or Shetland as these were not designated offices during the period specified.

Child Care

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children have been taken into care in each Scottish local authority to protect them from abuse within their family, in each year since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The available information relates to 1987, 1988 and 1989.

The following figures show the number of children who have received compulsory measures of care in relation to grounds (d), (dd) and (e) of section 32(2) of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, that is, as victims of offence, in the same households as schedule 1 offenders, and in the same households as incest victims.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the expenditure figures for each local authority area in social work each year since 1979 and the percentage of such expenditure on child care.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The social work gross expenditure figures for the years 1978-79 to 1988-89 and the percentage of expenditure attributed to child care are set out in the tables below.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement of Government policy towards provision for the profoundly mentally handicapped.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government's policy on care for all people with mental handicaps is that where possible they should be enabled to live in the community with appropriate support.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the statutory obligations of central and local government towards the provision of care for the profoundly mentally handicapped.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is as follows:

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is not held centrally.

Arson

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many arson attacks there were on Scottish schools in 1990; how many prosecutions resulted from such attacks; and what was the total cost to each Scottish education authority from arson.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In 1989, the latest year for which figures are available, fire brigades attended 322 fires in educational establishments in Scotland, of which 176 were recorded as deliberate or possibly deliberate. Separate figures are not available for the numbers of such fires in schools. Information on prosecutions resulting from wilful fire-raising does not identify the type of property involved. Information on the cost to education authorities from such attacks is not collected centrally.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total Scottish local authority (a) current expenditure and (b) capital expenditure as a percentage of Scottish gross domestic product in real terms in each year since 1974.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 16 April to a similar question.

Alcohol-related Crime

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what funding is provided by his Department to charities relating to alcohol abuse and related problems; and if he will specify (a) the charity and (b) the amounts given each year since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Financial assistance under section 16B of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978 and section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 has been provided in the period concerned to the charitable bodies set out in the table.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children have been reported to children's panels for alcohol-related offences each year since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information on referrals to reporters to children's panels for alcohol-related offences is available for only three regions and for the years 1987, 1988 and 1989. The figures are as follows:

	1987	1988	1989
Central	9	17	16
Grampian	6	9	7

Crime Statistics

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of crime reports submitted to the procurators fiscal by the police resulted in court proceedings in 1980, 1985 and 1990.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information which is set out in the table below refers to court proceedings as a percentage of all reports submitted to procurators fiscal, whether by the police or other reporting agency. The first column details the number of reports received in each of 1980, 1985 and 1990. The subsequent columns detail the disposals for each of those years, although some of the disposals may relate to reports received in the preceding year.

	Reports received	No proceedings	Non-court proceedings No further proceedings[1]	Warning letters	Conditional offers	Fiscal fines	Diversions	Balance resulting in court proceedings	Court proceedings as percentage of total

[1] Proceedings discontinued.
[2] Not separately recorded.
[3] Conditional offers were introduced in 1984.
[4] Fiscal fines were introduced in 1988.
[5] No figures are available for the numbers of diversions in 1980 and 1985. Such disposals would have been recorded as "no proceedings".

Health Service

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many national health service hospital beds were available and how many patients received hospital treatment in East Lothian in the first three months of 1981 and 1991, respectively.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The figures for the first quarter of 1981 are not available. At that date statistics relating to bed numbers and hospital treatment were recorded on an annual basis only. While statistics are now kept on a monthly basis, the figures for 1991 are not yet available.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent contact he has had with Arthritis Care; what issues were dealt with; and if he will make a statement about the development of rheumatology services.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There has been no recent contact with Arthritis Care. The development of rheumatology services is a matter for health boards to determine.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the remuneration given to each health board chairman and members.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on Friday 6 July 1990 to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), Official Report, Vol. 175, column 733.

Fife Social Work Department

Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish his report by Sheriff Kearney into Fife social work department; and if he will give details of the total costs of the inquiry.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The chairman of the inquiry into child care policies in Fife has finished hearing evidence from the parties concerned. My right hon. Friend is in correspondence with Sheriff Kearney about the likely date for submission of his report. I hope that we shall have his report by early summer. Pending completion of the inquiry, it is not possible to estimate its final costs.

Highlands and Islands Enterprise

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements he is making to publish the management statement for Highlands and Islands Enterprise.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Highlands and Islands Enterprise management statement sets out the financial, managerial and operational framework within which Highlands and Islands Enterprise will operate.

I am arranging for copies to be laid in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

Language Disorders

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the specialist schools for children with speech and language disorders in England at which pupils from Scotland are being educated with support from Scottish public funds.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 22 April 1991]: The information requested is not held centrally.

Play Areas (Accidents)

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children have been reported hurt in serious accidents in local authorities' play areas in each district in Scotland during the past 12 months.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 22 April 1991]: This information is not held centrally.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Animal Welfare

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what plans the Government have to put forward proposals calling for a higher status to be given to animal welfare in the treaty of Rome in the context of the inter-governmental conference;

(2) whether he intends to support the proposal which would give a higher status to animal welfare in the treaty of Rome, tabled by the German Government in the context of the inter-governmental conference.

Mr. Maclean: The treaty already provides power for action to be taken on animal welfare in areas which the Government consider appropriate for Community action, notably the protection of farm animals. We will participate constructively in any discussions on proposals to give a stronger emphasis to animal welfare.

Growth Promoters

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment his Department has made of the prevalence of the use of hormones and other illegal growth promoters in other countries of the European Community.

Mr. Maclean: Under the Residues Directive 86/469, EC member states are required to carry out a programme of surveillance for residues of veterinary drugs, including hormones and other illegal growth promoters. Details of results are required to be sent annually to the EC Commission, which has responsibility for making an assessment of the position. Results for 1990 are still being submitted to the Commission.

Private Water Supplies

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment his Department has made of the cost to farmers of the plans to charge for the monitoring of private water supplies.

Mr. Curry: The Government's consultation paper on private water supplies was circulated to interested parties earlier this year. Comments received including those covering farmers' interests are currently the subject of inter-departmental consideration.

Irrigation, East Anglia

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the horticultural industry in East Anglia about National Rivers Authority restrictions on the extraction of irrigation water from bore holes.

Mr. Curry: The Ministry has received a number of letters and telephone calls from, and held meetings with, farmers and growers and their representatives in East Anglia. Their main concern is the possible restriction by the authority of abstraction for irrigation to the hours beween 6 am and noon.

Whaling

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his current policy concerning whaling for scientific and research purposes.

Mr. Curry: The Government oppose any whaling for scientific and research purposes unless the International Whaling Commission is satisfied that it would not endanger the whale stocks in question and would provide valuable information that could not be obtained through non-lethal methods. The United Kingdom has taken the lead in sponsoring or co-sponsoring IWC resolutions calling upon the Governments of Japan, Norway, Iceland and Korea to reconsider their research programmes which did not fully meet these criteria. Iceland and Korea are not now carrying on scientific research, and programmes by Japan and Norway involve much lower numbers than was originally planned. We shall continue our firm policy against unjustified scientific whaling.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to meet his (a) Japanese, (b) Norwegian and (c) Icelandic counterpart to discuss the moratorium on commercial whaling.

Mr. Curry: The Governments of Japan, Norway and Iceland are kept well aware of our views on the moratorium on commercial whaling. I have also raised it in my recent meeting in Norway with the Norwegian Fisheries Minister. The moratorium will be discussed again at the forthcoming meeting of the International Whaling Commission in Reykjavik at the end of May.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will continue to support a moratorium on commercial whaling; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Yes: the conditions for lifting the moratorium are not met.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has sought any scientific advice on new whaling techniques.

Mr. Curry: Developments in techniques have been reported to the International Whaling Commission each year and we shall be seeking a further evaluation of these at the forthcoming meeting of the International Whaling Commission.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations he has received about the moratorium on commercial whaling.

Mr. Curry: We have received a great many representations about the moratorium on commercial whaling, many of which recognise the leading role the United Kingdom has played in working for the conservation of whales. We shall continue this work.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which environmental groups he has consulted about the moratorium on commercial whaling.

Mr. Gummer: My officials have recently discussed the moratorium on commercial whaling with representatives of Wildlife Link, the liaison body for the following major voluntary organisations in the UK concerned with wildlife: Care for the Wild, the Environmental Investigation Agency, Friends of the Earth, Greenpeace UK, the International Fund for Animal Welfare, the International League for the Protection of Cetaceans, the Marine Conservation Society, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the Whale and Dolphin Conservation Society, the World Society for the Protection of Animals and the World Wide Fund for Nature. I shall be meeting them myself shortly.

Screwworm Parasite Fly

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much money the United Kingdom contributes to the United Nations attempt to eradicate the American screwworm parasite fly in Libya.

Mrs. Chalker: I have been asked to reply. The United Kingdom has given full and early support to the screwworm eradication campaign, having contributed £1 million to a Food and Agriculture Organisation multi-donor trust fund. As further results of the programme become known, we will consider additional funding.

Written Answers to Questions

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Evidence Acts

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General if he will examine the use of the law of evidence Act by local authorities, and give guidelines on the practice of not having officers present in the court on all occasions for which a formal application is made under the Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: I have been asked to reply.

The Evidence Act 1938 and the Civil Evidence Act 1968, to which I assume the hon. Gentleman refers, apply to local authorities in the same way as to everyone else. I am not therefore aware of any evidence of need for such an examination or such guidelines.

Assault Cases

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Attorney-General whether he plans any changes in the procedures employed in preparing prosecution cases in incidents of assault where the victim or the only witness is mentally defective.

The Attorney-General: No. I am satisfied that the existing criteria contained in the code for Crown prosecutors, together with the internal procedures adopted by the Crown prosecution service in reviewing cases, are sufficient to promote considered and proper decisions.

Judicial Review

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Attorney-General if it is the normal practice for potential beneficiaries from the outcome of cases of judicial review to have to make concurrent applications.

The Attorney-General: Potential beneficiaries from the outcome of judicial review may make concurrent applications if they wish to do so. However, in cases involving a number of potential beneficiaries it is not unusual for one of their number to apply for judicial review in order to test the arguments to be advanced.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General whether any studies have been undertaken by or on behalf of the Lord Chancellor's Department into the privatisation or contractorisation of any services within its responsibilities.

The Attorney-General: As required by the "next steps" initiative, the Lord Chancellor's Department considered the options of privatisation and contracting out in relation to the Land Registry and the Public Record Office when considering their suitability for executive agency status. In both cases the most appropriate way forward was found to be the granting of executive agency status. The Land Registry was established as an executive agency in July 1990 and the Public Record Office will follow in April 1992. The Lord Chancellor's Department has contracted out nearly all basic services such as cleaning and catering and, in addition, has contracted out the Registry of County Court Judgments and the investment manager function of the Public Trust Office.

Like other Departments, the Lord Chancellor's Department keeps under review the options of privatisation and contractorisation in respect of a wide range of its functions.

ENVIRONMENT

Property Services Agency

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether, prior to the offer for sale, Property Services Agency services will be structured into two separate businesses;

(2) if he will make a statement on the progress towards privatisation of Property Services Agency services.

Sir George Young: Property Services Agency services were restructured last autumn into two main businesses, one dealing with project management and design and the other with maintenance. This will make it possible for Property Service Agency services to be offered for sale in more than one part, but final decisions on sale have not yet been taken. The businesses continue to make progress in reducing staff and costs in order to become competitive.

National Rivers Authority

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the National Rivers Authority expects to publish the results of its 1990 national survey.

Mr. Baldry: I understand that the NRA intends to publish results this autumn for comparison with those from the 1985 river quality survey.

Common Dog Whelk

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on why the common dog whelk has not re-established itself around the Isle of Wight since the banning of tributyl and the reasons for the differential between the island and other areas.

Mr. Baldry: The dog whelk is the most sensitive species to TBT contamination. Use of TBT-based paints on yachts until the ban in 1987 caused many populations to decline, especially in areas, such as the south coast, of intense yachting activity. Since the ban, there have been gradual improvements in water quality. However, the dog whelk has only limited ability to disperse and recolonise areas which were heavily impacted. Thus, it is likely to be some time before the Government's monitoring programme is able to demonstrate recovery of this species. There are surviving populations along the south coast of the Isle of Wight, but these have not contributed to any significant extent to the recolonisation of grossly affected areas. This is no different from the situation in other parts of the country where similar conditions prevail.

Drinking Water Quality

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a comprehensive list of every agreement that has been made with a water company for relaxation of any of the standards in the EC drinking water directive, together with dates by which compliance is required.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend has not entered into any agreements with water companies for the relaxation of standards. He has authorised relaxations of certain standards in certain circumstances under regulation 4 of the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989, which implements article 9 of the drinking water directive; and he has accepted undertakings from companies under section 20 of the Water Act 1989 where he was satisfied that the company was taking all appropriate action to secure or facilitate compliance with a particular standard.

Details of all authorisations and undertakings are available on the public register maintained by water companies. Copies of them are included in the register maintained by the Director General of Water Services and are available in the Library. In most cases compliance must be achieved by not later than 1995.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish full information about compliance with drinking water quality standards in every water supply zone.

Mr. Baldry: Each water company maintains a public register which contains full information for each water supply zone about the results of analysis of all sampling carried out by the company under the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989. Individuals are able to obtain copies of register entries from the companies. The first annual report of the drinking water inspectorate, to be published later this year, will summarise the extent to which each water company has complied with the requirements of the regulations in its water supply zones.

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what facilities he is making available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Heseltine: My Department is in contact with the St. John Ambulance Brigade and will be giving publicity to the "Over to you, John" appeal through its in-house journal.

Benzene

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to establish an air pollution monitoring network in the United Kingdom to include the monitoring of benzene levels and other hydrocarbons.

Mr. Baldry: My Department has been carrying out limited monitoring of United Kingdom levels of hydrocarbons, including benzene, for several years as part of a programme of research developing the technology for measuring these pollutants.

As announced in the environment White Paper, the Government aim to expand the existing urban monitoring networks. A first stage of this expansion is to be implemented early next year and will include two additional sites measuring benzene and other hydrocarbons.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the level of actual expenditure by Leeds development corporation on publicity and promotion in 1988-89, 1989-90, 1990-91, and the proposed level of expenditure in 1991-92; and if he will list the main elements of expenditure under the heading of publicity and promotion.

Mr. Key: Leeds development corporation's expenditure on publicity and promotion was £223,000 in 1988-89, £324,000 in 1989-90 and £480,000 in 1990-91. For 1991-92 the proposed level of expenditure is £500,000. The main elements of expenditure under the publicity and promotion heading are marketing of the urban development area and Leeds in general; the marketing of specific sites; publications; exhibitions; and community liaison.

Audible Bird Scarers

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish a revised code of practice relating to the use of audible bird scarers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: As soon as our work in responding to the recommendations of the noise review working party will allow. The recommendations include three on codes of practice.

Water Supplies

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures his Department has taken to assess the impact of the mild winters on domestic water supplies this summer in Chelmsford; and whether his Department expects any disruption to the supply of water.

Mr. Baldry: Such assessments are primarily for the water companies to make in conjunction with the National Rivers Authority, but I understand that in areas affected by shortages, including Chelmsford, companies expect to maintain supplies with selective restrictions on less essential uses until rainfall brings a substantial recovery in resources.

Standard Spending Assessment Handbook

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to make available his Department's publication entitled "The Standard Spending Assessment Handbook 1991-92".

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend has today placed copies of this document in the Library of the House. Copies have also been sent to every local authority in England and to the local authority associations.

Green Belt

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the development of redundant hospital sites in green belt areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 23 April 1991]: My Department issued a consultation paper on this subject on 11 March. The closing date for responses is 13 May. To date, 25 responses have been received.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to introduce a scheme for classifying green belt sites according to their environmental and amenity value.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 23 April 1991]: No. Such a scheme could imply that some parts of the green belt were less protected than others.

Council House Sales, Harrogate

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of council houses sold to tenants of Harrogate borough council.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 23 April 1991]: A table showing the available information on total sales for each English local authority since 1979-80 was recently placed in the Library. In the case of Harrogate borough council, almost all the reported sales have been to sitting tenants.

Industrial Sites (Noise)

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the maximum level of decibel noise laid down as reasonable for a B1 and B2 classification of an industrial site.

(2) what categories of industrial site are required to operate at a decibel level not exceeding 30 decibels.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 23 April 1991]: Industrial sites are not categorised by reference to decibel levels in planning, pollution control, or environmental protection legislation. Planning conditions may impose particular noise limits in individual cases.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Truancy

Sir Gerard Vaughan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will empower the governing bodies of schools as well as local education authorities to initiate prosecutions in cases of truancy.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so. Truancy needs to be tackled vigorously. Local education authorities have the power to prosecute the parents of truants, and it is important that they should use that power in appropriate cases.

Foreign Teachers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list by local education authority (a) the number of foreign teachers recruited from abroad who are teaching in schools for the latest date he has available and (b) the countries they come from.

Mr. Fallon: The information required is not collected centrally. From records held, out of 397,200 teachers in full-time service in local authority-maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools—England and Wales, March 1988—1,300 were trained outside the United Kingdom. Details of the countries in which they were trained are not readily available. The country in which they were trained is not necessarily their country of origin.

Insurance

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of state for Education and Science what estimates he has on the total cost of insurance premiums and insurance claims made by the education authorities in England in relation to teacher absence for reasons of sickness in 1988, 1989 and 1990; and what information he has as regards the first quarter of 1991.

Mr. Eggar This information is not available centrally.

School Library Books

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what average amount per pupil has been spent on school library books by Durham education authority each year since 1987.

Mr. Fallon: Information on school library books is not collected separately, but is contained within a figure for local education authority spending on text and library books. Figures returned by local education authorities for spending on books need to be treated with caution because of differing local authority practices in classifying spending between books and equipment. The table therefore shows, for each year for which information is available, spending figures for books and equipment together as well as for books separately.

Durham—Expenditure per pupil

Year	Books and Equipment £	Of which Books £
1986-87	30·68	9·42
1987-88	33·92	10·27
1988-89	44·87	12·38

St. Thomas More High School

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions there have been between Her Majesty's inspectorate, the Catholic church and Tameside metropolitan borough council about lack of space and facilities for the national curriculum at St. Thomas More high school, Denton.

Mr. Fallon: There has been no discussion between Her Majesty's inspectorate and the Salford Roman Catholic diocesan schools commission. There has been discussion between Her Majesty's inspectorate and the school and between the Department and the Salford Roman Catholic diocesan schools commission and Tameside metropolitan borough council.

School Buildings

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out, by local education authority, the level of capital spending on school buildings in 1978-79 and 1984-85, and the latest available years.

Mr. Fallon: The readily available information is shown in the table.

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place in the Library instructions given by his Department in relation to proposed contracts entered into by local education authorities concerning the assets of further education colleges since his statement in March.

Mr. Eggar: After my right hon. and learned Friend's statement, an official of the Department wrote to all chief education officers. Copies of this letter have been placed in the Library today. Further guidance will be issued shortly, and will also be placed in the Library.

Schools (Asbestos)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department will undertake a survey on the levels of asbestos in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: Risk of exposure to asbestos in buildings, including schools and colleges, was reported to be low by a Government working party in 1987. It is for local education authorities and other responsible bodies to judge the need for surveys in schools. In 1986 the Department distributed updated guidance on asbestos in educational establishments, including advice about the circumstances under which a survey might be required.

Haberdashers' Aske's CTC

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what specific mechanism has been incorporated in paragraph 8(ii) of the funding agreement for the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college for agreeing the value of the 99-year lease to be granted on the sites to be used for the purposes of the college.

Mr. Eggar: Paragraph 8 provides for the value of the lease to be agreed in writing between the Secretary of State and the CTC, after reference to the district valuer, at the time it is granted. If agreement is not reached, the value is to be determined by an expert appointed by agreement between the two parties, or if such agreement is not reached, one appointed by the president of the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors, the cost of this being borne equally between the two parties.

Higher Education (Expenditure)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the Government have spent (a) per student and (b) per graduate of higher education in each year since 1978-79 in (i) cash terms and (ii) real terms, indexed so that 1978-79 equals 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 22 April 1991]: Estimated public funding per student is shown for those higher education students at universities in Great Britain and polytechnics and colleges in England. Data are given for the financial years 1980-81 through to 1988-89. Data on cost per graduate are available from 1981-82 and are for higher education students in universities and polytechnics only for academic years.

Higher education: public funding per full-time equivalent student

	Cash (£)	Real index
1980-81	3,490	100
1981-82	3,700	97
1982-83	3,960	97
1983-84	4,040	94
1984-85	4,150	92
1985-86	4,240	89
1986-87	4,360	89
1987-88	4,600	89
1988-89	4,840	87

Higher education: cost per graduate (first degrees only)

	Cash (£)	Real index
1981-82	9,900	100
1982-83	10,300	98
1983-84	11,000	100
1984-85	11,500	99
1985-86	12,100	99
1986-87	12,800	101
1987-88	13,600	102
1988-89	13,800	96

The unit public funding figures are calculated by dividing estimated aggregate expenditure by financial year full-time equivalent student numbers.

The cost per graduate estimates reflect both recurrent and equipment costs. They exclude research and superannuation costs. The figures are necessarily approximate. Account is taken of average course length and the costs associated with those who fail to complete their course successfully. The real-terms indices have been calculated using the gross domestic product deflator.

PRIME MINISTER

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Cabinet Office in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

The Prime Minister: No expenditure has been incurred by the Cabinet Office on fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation since 1979-80 and none is planned for 1991-92.

Senior Civil Servants (Degrees)

Mr. Page: To ask the Prime Minister if he will numerate those Under Secretaries who have engineering, science or mathematics degrees; and what percentage that is of the total.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1991, c. 89]: Information now available records 110 Under Secretaries—22 per cent. of the total—with degrees in one or more of these subjects. Twenty-seven have engineering degrees, 70 have science degrees and 16 have mathematics degrees.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Escorts

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he has given to the costs and other consequences of police escorts for wide and heavily loaded vehicles; if he has considered whether this work can be taken over by public companies and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Association of Chief Police Officers has recently reviewed the current arrangements for providing police escorts for wide and heavily loaded vehicles. Its report is expected shortly and we shall consider any recommendations which the association may make.

Marriage Guidance

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to make available additional Government funding for Relate marriage guidance for the financial years 1992 to 1995.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This is under consideration as part of the current public expenditure survey.

Public Order Act

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answers to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Hicks) of 6 February, Official Report, column 141 and to the hon. Member for Teignbridge of 14 February, Official Report, column 547, and to his letter to the hon. Member for Teignbridge of 26 March, when he expects to announce the results of his review of section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We expect to announce our conclusions on section 39 very soon.

Non-animal Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department is taking to promote non-animal tests for cosmetics.

Mrs. Angela Rumbold: Before any project licence is granted, the applicant must show that he or she has considered alternatives not using living animals for any of the procedures. In the particular case of cosmetics, licences are granted only for the safety testing of these substances, generally in order to satisfy national and international regulatory and legal requirements for the protection of the public.

The Home Office, although not itself responsible for these regulations, will continue to support moves to encourage regulatory bodies to review their requirements so that they do not entail unnecessary testing on living animals.

In addition, the Home Office funds research into ways of reducing, refining or replacing the use of living animals in scientific procedures. Since the research scheme was established, some 10 projects have been funded, one of which was concerned with refining eye irritancy testing. This project may have particular implications for the safety testing of substances used in cosmetics, as well as many other products.

Fire Service

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those stations which the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority proposes to close and remove pump appliances from operational service.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This is at present wholly a matter for the London fire and civil defence authority. It will not become one for Ministers unless the authority submits proposals for closures of fire stations or reductions in the number of operational firefighters or firefighting appliances in accordance with the terms of section 19 of the Fire Services Act 1947.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will quantify the savings in mobilising time from fire stations in London that are currently being achieved by the CMC mobilising project in the London fire brigade.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The main objective of the London fire and civil defence authority's central mobilising project was to replace three centres and their outdated equipment with one which, with modern technology, would maintain high standards of emergency response throughout London. I am satisfied that this objective has been met.

Child Abuse

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many criminal convictions there have been for offences against children where children were abused by a parent in Blyth Valley and Northumberland in the last two years.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Except in the case of homicides, no information is collected centrally on convictions of parents for offences against their children. I understand that for Northumberland police force area there were two homicides of children in 1988 and one in 1989 which resulted in convictions of their parents for manslaughter.

Probation Service

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the average weekly cost per case in report work for magistrates courts by the probation services in England and Wales, including local and central costs in the last year for which records are available;

(2) what was the total cost to the probation service in England and Wales, including both local and central costs, of report work for magistrates courts in the last year for which records are available; and how many such cases were handled in that year by probation officers.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No separate information is available on the cost of report work for magistrates courts. The estimated average cost per social inquiry report completed, which includes reports for magistrates courts, in 1988-89 was £210, which the average for other types of report was £860—"Probation Statistics, England and Wales 1989", table 12.3. In 1989, a total of 140,230 social inquiry reports were prepared for magistrates courts, 7,160 domestic inquiries about custody of and access to children, 1,990 conciliation cases and a number of other types of report—tables 9.1, 9.2, 9.3 of "Probation Statistics". The cost estimate was based on information collected in 1977 and will be updated when the results of the 1990 national probation survey are available.

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average weekly cost per case in the provision of matrimonial supervision work by the probation service in England and Wales, including local and central costs, in the last year for which records are available.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The readily available information is the annual cost per domestic supervision case, which includes those cases resulting from matrimonial proceedings. In 1988-89 the average estimated cost per case was £610—"Probation Statistics, England and Wales, 1989" table 12.3. The estimate was based on information collected in 1977 and will be updated when the results of the 1990 national probation survey are available.

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the total cost to the probation service in England and Wales, including both local and central costs, of report work for divorce courts in the last year for which records are available; and how many such cases were handled in that year by probation officers;

(2) what was the average weekly cost per case in the report work for divorce courts by the probation service in England and Wales, including local and central costs, in the last year for which records are available.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No separate information is available centrally on the weekly or annual costs per case of report work for divorce courts. The costs are included in the estimated average cost per report for domestic reports, bail information means inquiries, inquiries for county courts and reports prepared on court appearance for sentence after deferment. In the financial year 1988-89, the estimated cost per report completed was £860—table 12.3 of "Probation Statistics, England and Wales 1989". In 1989, the probation service dealt with 25,420 domestic inquiries concerning custody of and access to children—table 9.2. The cost estimate was based on information collected in 1977 and will be updated when the results of the 1990 national probation survey are available.

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost to the probation service in England and Wales, including both local and central costs, of matrimonial supervision work in the last year for which records are available; and how many such cases were handled in that year by probation officers.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The available information is for the average cost per case receiving domestic supervision. In 1988-89 the estimated annual cost per case was £610; the number receiving domestic supervision following matrimonial proceedings was 3,240 in 1989—tables 1.2, 12.3 of "Probation Statistics, England and Wales, 1989". The cost estimate was based on information collected in 1977 and will be updated when the results of the 1990 national probation survey are available.

Durham Prison

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects slopping out to be discontinued in Her Majesty's prison Elvet, Durham; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Angela Rumbold: Slopping out is now planned to end at HM prison Durham late in 1994.

Crime, Blyth Valley

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what has been the percentage change in the number of crimes in the borough of Blyth Valley for 1990-91;

(2) how many car thefts were reported in the borough of Blyth Valley in the last three years.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information requested is not collated centrally for the borough of Blyth Valley.

Deportation

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to how many copies of form IM3A are distributed in each year by officers to persons stopped by them while on patrol and as to his policy on the issuing of each form to persons not guilty of any offence.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner that he is not aware of any instances of such forms being distributed to persons stopped by officers on patrol.

Form IM3—notice as regards liability to deportation —and form IM3A—acknowledgement of receipt of form IM3—are normally served on persons who are not British citizens, at the police station and following charging with an imprisonable offence.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many nationals from middle east countries issued with notices of intention to deport on national security grounds between November 1990 and January 1991 and who were removed from the United Kingdom following the making of a deportation order against them were so removed on or after 16 January.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None.

Burglaries, Leyton

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many burglaries there were in Leyton in each of the last three years; and what percentage those were of all reported crimes in the area.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information available centrally is for Waltham Forest and is given in the table. Tables giving numbers of offences recorded by the police in each borough of the Metropolitan police district are placed in the Library quarterly.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police in the Waltham Forest district of the Metropolitan police district

Year	Number of offences of burglary	Percentage of all recorded offences
1988	3,601	20
1989	4,352	22
1990	4,813	23

Bail

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will undertake a survey to determine the extent to which persons, who have been charged with an offence and subsequently released on bail, commit further offences prior to their cases being finalised by the courts.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: We have no plans to undertake a national survey of this kind. A number of police forces have made studies of crimes alleged to have been committed by people on bail.

Drug-related Offences

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis outlining the standing policy of the Stoke Newington division in policing drug abuse and drug dealing in its area; and what assessment has been made of the effectiveness of the policy.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the Stoke Newington division pursues an active multi-agency approach to drug abuse and drug dealing. The arrest of drug dealers was one of the main objectives for the division in 1990, and remains a priority for 1991. The division liaises with the local authority, commercial concerns and community groups.

This approach has resulted in the arrest of 120 persons for dealing in drugs during 1990, and there are indications of a slow but steady reduction in the number of people to be seen dealing in drugs on the streets. There have also been many drug seizures, including a particularly significant seizure of 240 kg of cannabis.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what studies the Government have (a) made and (b) published concerning asylum seekers in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: From time to time, and particularly in the context of their present review of asylum arrangements, the Government have made internal assessments of relevant issues. Published material on asylum seekers includes an annual Home Office statistical bulletin, most recently "Refugee Statistics, United Kingdom, 1989", issue 22/90, published last July, and specific chapters in the annual reports of the immigration and nationality department.

Mauritius

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many (a) men and (b) women have been allowed entry into the United Kingdom from Mauritius in each of the last five years;

(2) how many students from Mauritius have been allowed entry into the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information is given in the table:

Numbers of Mauritian citizens admitted to the United Kingdom, 1986 to 1990

Year	Total	Students
1986	17,600	350
1987	20,100	440
1988	20,000	510
1989	21,700	570
1990	23,100	690

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people from the island of Mauritius have been allowed the right of residence in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of Mauritian citizens accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom between 1986 and 1990 is given in the table.

Mauritian citizens accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom, 1986-90

Year	Numbers
1986	270
1987	300
1988	280
1989	220
1990	320

Animal Welfare

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he gives to local authorities regarding the department in which the official with responsibility for animal welfare should be stationed; and what information he keeps on the number and location of those officials.

Mrs. Rumbold: Local authorities have a number of officers with responsibilities for animal welfare who, in turn, have links with a number of Government Departments. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary does not issue guidance about how local authorities should allocate duties to their staff; nor is any central record held of the number or location of the staff concerned.

TRANSPORT

European Community Transport Council

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the outcome of the meeting of the European Community Transport Council on 27 March.

Mr. Rifkind: I attended the Council which made useful progress and prepared the ground for decisions on a variety of issues at the forthcoming Council on June 20 and 21.

On railways, Ministers reached broad agreement on greater autonomy from government for national railway undertakings, financial restructuring of those undertakings, public service obligations and the desirability of separate accounting for operations and for infrastructure. A range of views was also expressed on Commission proposals for access to railway networks by new operators for both domestic and international services. The presidency invited the committee of permanent representatives—COREPER—to consider the issues further in the light of the discussion with the aim of revised proposals being brought before the June Council.

In aviation, the Council adopted a measure which will enable quick action to be taken against air carriers engaging in predatory activity. This safeguard is a vital complement to the liberalised single market being developed in the Community.

In the course of a discussion about the effect of Gulf hostilities on air carriers, the Commission undertook to present to the Council a report on state aids. The Commission reported that negotiations on air services arrangements with Norway and Sweden had ended successfully and that a draft agreement would be presented to the Council shortly. The Council considered whether the air cargo regulation adopted at its previous meeting should be extended to additional carriers, and concluded that further work was needed.

The negotiations on alpine transit being conducted by the Commission with third countries on behalf of member states were discussed at length and included a lunchtime session with the Swiss and Austrian Ministers. It was concluded that the talks should continue along the lines of the existing mandate. The Commission was given additional flexibility to pursue, with Austria, the possibility of a system which would limit total gaseous emissions from transit vehicles and, with Switzerland, the possibility of exemptions from the Swiss 28-tonne limit for HGVs.

Turning to road safety, an agreement in principle emerged on roadworthiness testing for cars, but consideration was postponed until June. The Commission urged on member states the benefits to be gained from further safety measures, and stated that it would analyse the recently published Gerondeau report on road safety to see what scope there was for proposals to be made. Several member states stressed the importance of the Council giving careful consideration to the report. The presidency undertook to produce a draft resolution on the report for consideration in June. Talks on the Community driving licence centred on the introduction of the new format in certain member states and provision for the testing of motor cyclists; the proposed second directive was referred back to COREPER for technical points to be further considered in preparation for a decision in June.

Finally, on a general note, the Transport Commissioner, Mr. Van Miert, said that he intended to draw up a white paper, setting out the Commission's broad approach to future Community transport policy, for discussion at a forthcoming Council.

Road Safety

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will set out the arguments on which Her Majesty's Government have based their view that article 75 of the treaty of Rome empowers the Council of Ministers to legislate on road safety matters;

(2) when Her Majesty's Government came to the view that article 75 of the treaty of Rome empowered the Council of Ministers to legislate on road safety matters.

Mr. Chope: The Government have always recognised that there is doubt whether a successful legal challenge could be brought against a Community measure on road safety based on article 75 of the treaty. The arguments on competence were most recently set out during the Standing Committee debate on 13 March 1991 in EC documents 9228/88 and 10333/90 on the compulsory use of seat belts.

MV Polly Anna

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he has taken in response to the complaint made to his Department by Mr. S. Norman in January concerning the infringement of safety standards relating to the MV Polly Anna; what information he has on the whereabouts of the MV Polly Anna; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Following the complaint in December 1990, my Department placed the Polly Anna, which is not a UK-registered vessel, on the watchlist for inspection if it returned to the UK. However, in January the vessel was detained by the Gibraltar authorities because of its general condition, the condition of its equipment and its lack of proper certification.

The vessel broke the detention order by sailing from Gibraltar on 26 January. She was immediately placed on the watchlists of all other administrations which are signatories of the memorandum of understanding on port state control. It is now understood that shortly after this the vessel was detained in Greece, and abandoned by its crew. My Department has sought further details from the Greek authorities.

Stansted Airport Rail Link

Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the projected rate of return on British Rail's Stansted airport link investment; and what is the rate of return (a) so far achieved and (b) estimated for the current year.

Mr. Freeman: The projected rate of return on investment when the Stansted express was approved was 5 per cent. The Stansted express has been operational for only one month so it is too early to comment on its performance so far or provide estimates for the current year.

Speed Limiters

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to which foreign countries require speed limiters to be fitted to cars.

Mr. Chope: I am not aware of any country which requires speed limiters to be fitted to cars.

A1, Northumberland

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any further plans for improvements to the A1 in Northumberland.

Mr. Chope: Initial investigations by the joint A1 steering group identified a number of low-cost safety schemes for the route in Northumberland which have now been included in the regional programme. Any further proposals must await the final report of the steering group.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when direct passenger trains will start to run through the channel tunnel (a) from London to Paris, (b) from Leeds to Paris and (c) from Edinburgh to Paris.

Mr. Freeman: Day services from London to Paris will commence when the tunnel opens. Negotiations are continuing between British Rail and the manufacturers to overcome technical difficulties relating to the day trains for direct services from cities north of London. No timetable for the delivery of these trains has yet been agreed, but they are unlikely to enter service before 1994. British Rail still plans to run night services both from London and direct from cities north of London when the tunnel opens.

Chelmsford Roads

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures his Department is taking to tidy up litter along the A12 Chelmsford bypass and other roads in the parliamentary constituency of Chelmsford which come under his Department's responsibilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: As from 1 April 1991, the responsibility for clearance of litter from trunk roads was passed to the district and borough councils under the terms of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress on the widening of the A12 Chelmsford bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: We hope to let a design commission this summer and announce our preferred option in 1993.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the progress on the building of the proposed M12 from the M25 to Chelmsford.

Mr. Chope: Design consultants were appointed at the end of 1990. The target for announcement of a preferred route is 1993.

Smoke Hoods (Aircraft)

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has yet reached a view on the mandatory provision of smoke hoods in aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: The CAA is today publishing a report on "Improving Passenger Survivability in Aircraft Fires—a Review" (CAP 586). In that document it reports its view that after a prolonged investigation of this matter, it believes that the compulsory provision of smokehoods would on balance not be in the interests of safety.

I have noted that the majority of expert opinion including the aviation safety authorities of other countries who have looked into this matter, share the CAA's conclusion. However, other views have been expressed and I welcome the CAA's assurance that it will keep under review all technological developments both in smoke-hoods and other survival techniques.

Transpennine Road

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the consultant's report on the transpennine road crossing.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 23 April 1991]: We expect to receive the final report shortly. We shall make an announcement after assessing its findings and recommendations.

EMPLOYMENT

Docks (Accidents)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the number of accidents and injuries reported to the Health and Safety Executive in each of the former national dock labour scheme ports in each year since 1979 by port.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what criteria were used in training and enterprise councils making application for a share of the extra £120 million awarded to the employment training programme; what criteria were used by the Training, Enterprise and Education Directorate in distributing the funds; and whether any training and enterprise councils have complained to the regional director about the amount they have received.

Mr. Jackson: The additional £120 million for employment training in the current financial year was made available to allow ET to make the same contribution to assisting the long-term unemployed as had been expected when original budgets were allocated to training and enterprise councils in November 1990.

Additions to ET budgets were agreed with TECs to help ensure that the Government's guarantee of an offer of an opportunity to 18 to 24-year-olds unemployed between six and 12 months and the Government's aim of an offer of an opportunity to 18 to 49-year-olds unemployed for two years or longer were met. Additional resources were also allocated to enable TECs to assist other long-term unemployed people, especially those with special training needs. TECs have welcomed these additions to their ET budgets.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the extra funds awarded to the employment training programme has been specifically targeted by training and enterprise councils to enhance the unit price of training for people with disabilities and learning difficulties; and if he will give an analysis of where the £120 million was distributed by TECs.

Mr. Jackson: It is not possible to identify separately the proportion of the additional £120 millions made available for employment training in the current financial year which has been targeted by training and enterprise councils on provision for people with disabilities and learning difficulties. The extra money has been incorporated in TEC business plans which are commercially confidential.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Middle East

14. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he now proposes to take to promote arms control in the middle east; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: We want to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the missiles used to deliver them. We will work through the nuclear suppliers group, the Australia group and the missile technology control regime to choke off the supply of the materials, components and technology needed to manufacture such weapons.

We will also pursue a more responsible approach internationally to conventional weapons transfers, including through a UN register of arms transfers to monitor the scale of arms build-up in any country.

29. Mr. Archer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on recent efforts by Her Majesty's Government to promote the peace process in the middle east.

31. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made by Her Majesty's Government towards the convening of an international conference on the middle east.

38. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made since the end of the Gulf war towards a comprehensive peace settlement in the middle east.

39. Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current stage of the middle east peace process.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Since the end of the Gulf conflict the United States Secretary of State has launched a new initiative aimed at starting peace negotiations between Israel and her neighbours, including the Palestinians. He has visited the area three times. We support his efforts to secure agreement from the parties to attend a regional conference, and are encouraging them to do so. Our European partners are in agreement with this approach. We still think it likely that an international conference under United Nations auspices will be needed at a later stage.

Kuwait

18. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the authorities in Kuwait about the treatment of Palestinians in that country since the end of the Gulf war.

Mr. Hurd: I expressed concern to Kuwaiti Ministers, even before the liberation of Kuwait, that the rule of law should be re-established as quickly as possible after the Government's return. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Defence both raised the treatment of Palestinians during their visits to Kuwait soon after liberation. Our ambassador has reinforced this message. I expect to visit Kuwait myself very soon.

British Hostages

19. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will indicate what recent action has been taken to obtain the return of the hostages in the Lebanon.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We continue to make every effort in our contacts with the Iranian authorities, who we believe to have a decisive influence, to secure the release of the hostages. We have also contacted other countries, and the EC troika, to reinforce the point in their own dealings with Iran.

Most recently, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development raised the matter with the Iranian Foreign Minister on 20 April.

Moscow Human Rights Conference

20. Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether it is Her Majesty's Government's intention to attend the human rights conference in Moscow in September.

Mr. Hurd: We shall decide somewhat later.

South Africa

15. Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he intends to meet the new South African ambassador.

16. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to visit South Africa to discuss recent political developments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I met Mr. Kent Durr, the new South African ambassador, on 18 April. I hope to visit South Africa in the summer.

21. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to ensure the implementation of the United Nations declaration on South Africa, adopted in December 1989.

32. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to ensure implementation of the United Nations declaration on South Africa, adopted by the 16th special session of the general assembly in December 1989.

34. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to ensure implementation of the United Nations declaration on South Africa adopted in December 1989.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We continue to encourage all sides in South Africa to maintain progress towards the aims set out in the United Nations declaration—the end of apartheid and the adoption of a non-racial democratic constitution arrived at by peaceful means through negotiation.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to ensure the implementation of the United Nations declaration on South Africa adopted at the 14th special session in December 1989.

Mrs. Chalker: We continue to encourage all sides in South Africa to maintain progress towards the aims set out in the United Nations declaration—the end of apartheid and the adoption of a non-racial democratic constitution arrived at by peaceful means through negotiation.

Lithuania

22. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on recent developments in connection with Lithuania.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We were encouraged by the news that negotiations took place between Lithuanian and Soviet authorities on 4 April. We shall continue to urge both sides to negotiate constructively to reach a solution acceptable to both sides.

EC Legislative Competence

23. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ask the European Commission to make a declaration of the areas of legislative competence over which the EC will choose not to claim competence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Areas of Community competence are defined by the Community treaties, as interpreted by the European Court of Justice. The extent of Community competence is one of the questions under discussion in the intergovernmental conference on political union. But my hon. Friend will not be surprised to hear that Her Majesty's Government are not convinced of the need for any significant extension of Community competence.

Poland

24. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to send medical aid to Poland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have already done so, together with European Community partners. The EC provided £2·8 million of medical aid in 1990. The United Kingdom share was about 18 per cent. The EC has received no further requests for medical aid from the Polish Government.

Our bilateral health co-operation agreement with Poland promotes wide-ranging medical contacts. We have also supported several medical training projects under the know-how fund.

Vietnam and Cambodia

25. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last discussed Vietnam or Cambodia with the American Secretary of State.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed Cambodia with Mr. Baker in New York in September 1990 and the Vietnamese boat people issue in Washington on 28 February. Indo-China issues are regularly discussed with the Americans at senior official level.

Syria

26. Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on United Kingdom relations with Syria.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Since resumption of relations, the Syrian Foreign Minister visited London in February and last month I met President Assad in Damascus. Syria has an important role to play in regional security and the peace process.

The Gulf

27. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement on how many countries have made contributions in cash or in kind to the United Kingdom's military and logistical effort in the Gulf.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Cash contributions promised so far include about £660 million from Kuwait, £565 million from Saudi Arabia, £275 million from Germany, £250 million from UAE, £183 million from Japan, £15 million from Belgium, £15 million from Hong Kong and £8 million from Denmark. We have also received assistance in kind worth about £250 million from some 16 countries.

Yugoslavia

28. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited Yugoslavia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has not yet visited Yugoslavia. I visited Belgrade and Zaghreb on 25 to 28 February.

Human Rights

30. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reaction was given by the United Nations committee on human rights to the presentation of the United Kingdom's third periodic report on 1 and 2 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The human rights committee considered the United Kingdom's report at six public meetings on 1 to 3 April. There was a detailed and constructive dialogue. While individual members of the committee expressed a number of specific concerns, there was general satisfaction with the report and the manner in which the dialogue took place.

Political Union

33. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the United Kingdom's proposed definition of subsidiarity in the context of the intergovernmental conference on political union.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We should like to see a clear definition of subsidiarity in the treaty, as a general provision covering all areas of Community activity. The definition would clarify the division of responsibilities between member states and the Community. It should make clear that action should be taken at the Community level only when the objective in question cannot be satisfactorily achieved at member state level.

Nicaragua

35. Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited Nicaragua.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I visited Nicaragua from 18 to 20 March, mainly to attend the seventh annual "San José" meeting between Foreign Ministers of the Twelve, central America, Mexico, Colombia and Venezuela. This was a successful meeting, which discussed a wide range of political and economic issues. I also had a brief bilateral programme in Nicaragua, including a meeting with the Foreign Minister and the signing of an agreement allowing the Commonwealth Development Corporation to operate in Nicaragua.

Conventional Forces in Europe Treaty

36. Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in the implementation of the conventional forces in Europe treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We and our NATO partners are continuing to press the Soviet Union to ensure the full and early implementation of the conventional forces in Europe treaty.

United States of America

37. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the President of the United States and Secretary Baker to discuss United Kingdom/USA relations.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My right hon. Friend is regularly in touch with Secretary Baker. He expects to meet him and President Bush again next month.

Sudan

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are being taken to persuade the Sudanese Government to allow human rights and freedom of worship to prevail in Sudan.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We take every opportunity to impress on the present Government of Sudan the need for all the people of Sudan to enjoy a full range of human rights. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development last did so on 18 April when she saw the country's Finance Minister. Regrettably, none of the representations made to the Sudanese authorities have so far borne fruit. Sudan's record on human rights remains deplorable.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 17 April, why at the meeting between General Schwarzkopf and the Iraqi military authorities no consideration was given to placing of limitations on the use of helicopters.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Iraqi use of helicopters was considered at the meeting between General Schwarzkopf and the Iraqi military authorities on 3 March on the suspension of hostilities. No limitation was placed on their use.

Palestine Liberation Organisation

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the meeting between Her Majesty's ambassador in Tunis and a representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, Mr. Hakam Balawi; and whether the ambassador conveyed to Mr. Balawi Her Majesty's Government's expressed concern at the support given to Saddam Hussein throughout the Gulf war by the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Her Majesty's ambassador in Tunis has frequent meetings with PLO officials, including Hakam Balawi, whom he last saw on 15 April. He has made quite clear to the PLO our strong disapproval of its equivocal policy on the Gulf crisis.

SCOTLAND

Homes for the Elderly

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list, for each local authority, the number of homes they run for the elderly which have (a) closed and (b) transferred out of the local authority sector, in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information in precisely the form requested is not held centrally. However, I am aware of one home which has transferred from local authority ownership and information on the closure of homes derived from a comparison of local authority returns is set out in the table.

Underspends

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which Departments under his responsibility will have an underspend of over £500,000 in the past finacial year.

Mr. Lang: Wholly reliable estimates of outturn for 1990-91 are not yet available. The best estimates currently available are published in the "Summary and Guide to the 1991-92 Supply Estimates"—Cm. 1454—and the estimates themselves.

Provisional outturn for 1990-91 on cash-limited expenditure will be reported to Parliament through a White Paper as soon as possible. Details of outturn on non-cash limited voted expenditure will be available in the appropriation accounts in the normal way.

Departmental Service

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will commission a survey of customer satisfaction with the Scottish Office on the same basis as that recently conducted for East Lothian district council; and if he will make a statement on public perceptions of the quality of service provided by his Department.

Mr. Lang: No.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy for the storage of used fuel from nuclear installations in Scotland after 1993.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Questions about operational aspects of nuclear installations in Scotland, such as spent fuel storage, are a matter for the operators concerned. Scottish Nuclear Ltd. has recently put forward proposals for the long-term storage of spent fuel at both Hunterston and Torness; these proposals are currently being evaluated.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the sources of separate expenditures on renewable energy programmes in or for Scotland in each year since 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Government support for programmes of research and development into renewable energy sources is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list his Department's current and planned renewable energy programmes in Scotland by type, cost, site location and capacity.

Mr. Allan Stewart: These programmes are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Teachers

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimates or figures he has on the total cost of the insurance premiums paid and the claims made by education authorities in Scotland in relation to teacher absence through sickness in 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I understand that no education authority in Scotland has taken out insurance for this purpose.

Schools

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each year since 1980 the number of children in each local authority region in Scotland transferred from special schools to mainstream schools, expressing this (a) as a proportion of the special school population in each region and (b) as a proportion of children in each region.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many primary school boards within the Paisley, South constituency have communicated with him directly on the subject of national testing; how many indicated opposition to his proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Two school boards have written letters recounting parental concern expressed at public meetings.

Unemployed Young People, Renfrew

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many young people under 18 years there are in Renfrew district who are not employed and have not had a youth training opportunity offered to them.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Sixty.

Community Care

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to bring community care currently undertaken by social work departments within the scope of fund-holding general practitioner practices.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: General practitioners already play a major part in supporting community care services. I shall be giving further consideration in due course to how fund-holding practices in Scotland might be further involved.

Trunk Roads

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about progress on trunk road schemes during 1990-91 and those proposed to start in 1991-92.

Mr. Lang: Details of major scheme starts in 1990-91 and expected scheme starts in 1991-92 are as follows:

Schemes with an estimated cost of over £1 million started since 1 April 1990

A74 Upgrading Millbank—Nether Abington
A74 Upgrading Elvanfoot—Paddy's Rickle Bridge
A74 Upgrading Kirkpatrick Fleming—Gretna
M74 Maryville—West of Fullarton Road (Advance works)
A96 Nairn Railway Bridge Replacement
A75 Carrutherstown—Hetland
A77 Bennane Hill
A1 Tower—Dunglass

These schemes have a total value of £122 million.

Schemes with an estimated cost of over £1 million expected to start by 31 March 1992

A74 Upgrading Nether Abington—Elvanfoot
M74 Maryville—West of Fullarton Road
M8 St. James Interchange
A96 Bucksburn Diversion
A9 Greenloaning—Blackford
A929 Tarbrax—Forfar
A94 Brechin Bypass (Dualling)

These schemes have a total value in excess of £130 million. I have made a further £4 million available in 1991-92 over the public expenditure provision I announced in November to accommodate the substantial programme.

In addition, I expect good progress to be made with the route action plans being developed on the A96 Aberdeen-Inverness; the A85 Perth-Dundee; the A7 south of Hawick; and—jointly with the Department of Transport—on the A1 Newcastle-Edinburgh routes. I expect to be able to give a more detailed account of the full extent of our proposals for Scottish roads in a policy document to be issued later this year.

As to completions of major schemes, 10 were completed in 1990-91 and 11 are expected to be completed in 1991-92.

Haemolytic Anaemia (Kuwait)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had from WHO, UNICEF and the Red Cross about alleviating haemolytic anaemia in Kuwait.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 15 April 1991]: There have been no representations from these organisations to my right hon. Friend about haemolytic anaemia in Kuwait. If the hon. Member has a particular concern about this matter, he may wish to write to me about it.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis for the years 1966-67 to 1990-91, otherwise identical in format to table 2 of "Scottish Local Government Financial Statistics: Summary Volume 1975-76 to 1987-88", of rate fund services revenue account but which distinguishes domestic rate revenue from non-domestic rate revenue.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 15 April 1991]: Table 1 gives figures for 1966-67 to 1974-75. Due to differences in the form of the data collected prior to 1975-76 the format of this table differs slightly from that published in "Scottish Local Government Financial Statistics: Summary Volume 1975-76 to 1987-88". Table 2 gives an estimated breakdown of rate income into domestic and non-domestic income for the years 1975-76 to 1987-88, consistent with the figures published in the summary volume. Table 3 gives figures for 1988-89. Figures for 1989-90 and 1990-91 are not yet available.

THE ARTS

Arts Funding

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister for the Arts what progress has been made in implementing the reforms in the structure of arts funding.

Mr. Renton: Good progress has been made since my statement to the House on 19 December, (Official Report, columns 300-01).

The chairs of seven of the 10 new regional arts boards have now been appointed with my consent, and a good start has been made in appointing other board members. All the new boards are on target to be in place and operational from 1 October.

The Arts Council has also submitted the advice that I called for on the staffing structures for the new system, and on the initial stage of delegation of clients to the new boards from 1 April 1992. I have today written to the chairman of the Arts Council setting out my conclusions on these matters, and a copy of my letter has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

I am confident that the process of reform on which my predecessors and I have embarked will produce a system which delivers a better service to the public through a clearer definition of responsibilities. I am anxious to ensure that one of the original aims of the reforms—that of securing administrative savings—is also achieved.

I have therefore asked the chairman of the Arts Council to build on the work already done by the Arts Council and the regional bodies to ensure that this is realised. To assist in this process I have set as a guideline the achievement of a progress administrative saving of at least £1 million per annum in current terms by 1993-94, by which time the present reforms will have been substantially implemented. This represents around 10 per cent. of current staff costs. I have every confidence that the Arts Council and the regional bodies will be able to achieve a saving of this order. It is a challenging but attainable target. It is most important that the public throughout the country get the opportunity to see more performances of quality and that arts organisations get a greater share of the public subsidy.

I have asked the Arts Council to ensure that the necessary further work is undertaken quickly to ensure that the new boards are fully operational from 1 October 1991 as planned.

I have also approved an initial list of bodies for delegation from the Arts Council to the new regional arts boards on 1 April 1992. As I said in my earlier statement, further significant delegation from 1993 will need to await the outcome of work on the national arts strategy, due for completion in the middle of next year. The Arts Council has proposed that there should be some scope for further delegation in the meantime.

I would see this happening on only a fairly limited scale, and where it is clear to all parties that this would be beneficial. The Arts Council has also proposed, and I have accepted, that the new boards should be involved now in the joint assessment of clients who in due course may be administered by them. This will be most important in building up the confidence of clients in the ability of the new boards.

A great deal of work has also been done to improve still further present systems of planning, budgeting and control. I have asked the Arts Council to ensure that this work is translated into a clear statement of policy objectives for all parts of the system, and that management systems, including an appropriate range of performance indicators, are developed to ensure that these objectives are achieved. These indicators will also need to assess customer satisfaction. I shall expect to see the results of this work reflected in the Arts Council's corporate plan for 1992-93, and in the corresponding corporate plans for the new regional arts boards.

I expect these decisions to lead to a better structured and leaner arts funding system which will be able to manage the further delegation of clients with a corresponding benefit to the ultimate beneficiaries, the clients and the general public.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Uprated Benefits

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) widows and (b) recipients of income support, who are liable to pay an increase in their council rents from 1 April will not receive their uprated benefit until 9 and 15 April respectively.

Miss Widdecombe: People in receipt of housing benefit have their entitlement recalculated to take account of any rent increase from the date on which the increase takes effect. Those in receipt of income support are entitled to maximum housing benefit which can meet up to 100 per cent. of their eligible rent.

The most recent information available shows that, in May 1989, there were 48,000 women in receipt of state widows' benefits and pensions, but not income support, who were also in receipt of housing benefit and living in local authority accommodation.

In February 1990 there were 1,760,000 people in receipt of income support who were also living in local authority accommodation.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much money is saved by the Government as a result of the arrangements for payment in arrears of widow's benefit and income support to those whose council rents were raised on 1 April.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Industrial Injury

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cases of compensation for industrial injury have been discounted under the 14 per cent. rule in each year from 1986 to 1990.

Mr. Scott: Available information for such disallowances is as follows:

Period	Claims disallowed
December 1986 to March 1987	12,348
April 1987 to March 1988	47,234
April 1988 to March 1989	41,755
April 1989 to March 1990	41,741
April 1990 to February 1991 (latest date available)	36,213

Adjudication Regulations

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the total amount awarded by his Department under regulation 72 of the Adjudication Regulations for each year since 1987; and what was the average and median amount awarded in each case for each year, adjusted for 1991 prices.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in how many cases regulation 72 of the Adjudication Regulations has been used in each year since April 1987 for each (a) type of benefit and (b) claimant category.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available.

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what facilities he has made available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Miss Widdecombe: We have not made any special arrangements for staff to contribute to this appeal. However, it is possible for staff to contribute to St. John Ambulance under our arrangements for payroll giving to charities.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many people in England and Wales lost their entitlement to the reduced community charge rate of 20 per cent. as a result of receiving an award of criminal injuries compensation during 1990-91;

(2) in how many cases his Department was notified by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board of a compensation award to an individual receiving social security benefits;

(3) in the last year for which figures are available, how many claimants of social security benefits ceased to receive benefits, or had their benefits reduced, as a result of receiving an award of criminal injuries compensation.

Mr. Scott: Reduction in benefits resulting from an award of criminal injuries compensation is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. I understand from him that the information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Social Fund

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of income support claimants in Leicestershire are repaying social fund loans; and how much money is outstanding.

Mr. Scott: The administration of income support and the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. and learned Member with such information as is available as soon as possible and copies will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

Pensions (European Community)

Mr. Bendall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the Government have received a reply from the European Commission to the letter of 9 October 1989 from the United Kingdom permanent representative to the European Communities seeking its views on the position of bridging pensions in the context of directive 86/378/EEC on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment in occupational social security systems.

Miss Widdecombe: A reply was received from the head of directorate general 5 of the European Commission on 17 April 1991. I am arranging for copies of his reply to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses and to be sent to those organisations and individuals who have expressed an interest in the issue.

Low Incomes

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he makes, on the best available evidence, of the numbers of persons, and the percentage of the total population, who were living on incomes less than 60 per cent. of the national average in 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1985 and 1990, or in those years nearest to these dates where the relevant information is available.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 6 December 1990]: Information in precisely the form requested is available only for the years for which "Households Below Average Income"—HBAI—has been published. Other information is available for earlier years, but the methodologies and definitions used differ substantially and it is therefore not appropriate to make direct comparisons throughout the whole period.

It is also important to remember that real personal disposable income per head in the United Kingdom has risen substantially during this period. The percentage of the population who were living on incomes below any constant threshold has fallen. Thus, for example, the numbers of people living below 60 per cent. of the 1979 national average equivalised income, before housing costs, fell from 9 million in 1979 to 6·9 million in 1987.

Sources are the CSO's annual redistribution of income —ROI—articles and the published family expenditure survey—FES—reports; the estimates listed in the table are made from the most appropriate published source for each year. All the pre-HBAI analyses are in terms of numbers of households rather than population, and none of them used equivalisation to adjust for differing household sizes and compositions. Various different definitions of income have been used, and the one from the FES reports in 1960-61 and 1965-66 is a pre-tax gross income measure.

All the figures are derived from the family expenditure survey and thus cover only the household population.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Late Payment Charges

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the revenue coming to the Exchequer from charges and penalties for late payment of (a) VAT, (b) income tax, (c) national insurance and (d) corporation tax in each financial year since 1979; and what was the number of individuals and companies paying such penalties in each year.

Mr. Maude: Information is not available on the total numbers paying penalties or charges for late payment of tax, nor on receipts for all the years requested. The available information is:

Receipts from interest charges and penalties for late payment (£ million)

Year	VAT[1]	Income tax[2,3]	Corporation tax[2]
1983-84	—	77·8	43·0
1984-85	—	86·9	50·6

1989-90	82·1	187·1	131·1
1990-91	83·2	—	—

[1] No charges or penalties for late payment of VAT prior to introduction of VAT default surcharge from 1 October 1986; negligible receipts in 1986-87.

[2] Information for 1990-91 is not yet available.

[3] Includes small sums in respect of class 4 (self-employed) national insurance contributions. Penalties generally for late payment of NICs were introduced in the Social Security Act 1990, with effect from 1990-91.

Manufactures

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing the balance of trade (a) in manufactures and (b) in manufactures, less erratics, with the EC at current prices on a balance of payments basis in 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Mellor: Information on trade in manufactures with the EC on a balance of payments basis is available on the Central Statistical Office database which may be accessed through the Library of the House. The information requested for manufactures less erratics is not available on a balance of payments basis.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing the balance of trade in manufactures, less erratics, on a balance of payments basis for each year since 1970 in terms of 1990 prices together with the corresponding figures for imports and exports.

Mr. Mellor: Information from which trade in manufactures less erratics at 1990 prices may be derived is available on the Central Statistical Office database which may be accessed through the Library of the House.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing the balance of trade in finished manufactures, less erratics, on a balance of payments basis for each year since 1970 in terms of 1990 prices, together with the corresponding figures for imports and exports.

Mr. Mellor: Information from which trade in finished manufactures less erratics at 1990 prices may be derived is available on the Central Statistical Office database which may be accessed through the Library of the House.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing the balance of trade in manufactures, less erratics, with the EEC Twelve on a balance of payments basis for each year since 1970 in terms of 1990 prices, together with the corresponding figures for imports and exports.

Mr. Mellor: Information on trade with the EC is not available at constant prices.

Pensions

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the national income was spent on retirement pensions in each year since 1975.

Mr. Mellor: Retirement pensions paid out by the national insurance fund, together with pensions and other benefits paid by public and private sector occupational pension schemes are estimated to have amounted to the following percentages of national income:—

	Per cent.
1975	10·9
1976	11·1
1977	11·3
1978	11·3
1979	11·4
1980	12·2
1981	13·7
1982	14·1
1983	14·2
1984	14·2
1985	14·4
1986	15·2
1987	15·2
1988	14·2
1989	14·2

Consumer Goods

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing consumption of consumer goods other than food and fuel as a percentage of gross domestic product in each year since 1961 together with his estimate of the proportion supplied by imports.

Mr. Mellor: Information requested for the first part of the question can be derived from data on the CSO's database, which may be accessed through the Library. The database identifiers are:

GDP at market prices (CAOB)

Consumers' expenditure on goods other than food and energy products

Sum of:
Durable goods (AIIL)
Alcohol and tobacco (CDFH)
Clothing and footwear (CDDE)
Other goods (CCED)

In respect of the final part of the question, information on the proportion supplied by imports is not available. Such information as is available on the import content of demand is given in CSO's periodic input-output tables, for example, tables 2 and 3 of the 1984 tables. Information on import penetration has also been provided in "Business Monitor" MQ12.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing the gross output of manufacturing industry, excluding inter-industry transfers, in 1970, 1973, 1979, 1985, 1988, 1989, and a forecast for 1990.

Mr. Mellor: The information on gross output for manufacturing is published annually at current prices in "Business Monitor 'PA1002' Report on the Census of Production" summary volume. Copies of this volume up to 1988 are available from the Library. Transfers of goods produced by a business to departments not covered by the census, including other businesses in the same enterprise group, are treated within output as sales, valued as if sold to an independent buyer. Forecasts of gross output are not available.

Central Office of Information

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Central Office of Information in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: No fees have been paid by the Central Office of Information in the furtherance of privatisation. However, the COI has been involved in privatisation publicity campaigns. Details for years 1979-80 to 1989-90 were given at column 167 on 13 March 1990. Details for the year 1990-91 are as follows:

December 1990 Electricity: Distribution companies
March 1991 Electricity: Generators

The costs of these campaigns have been included in answers provided by the Government Department concerned.

Current Account

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing, for each year from 1970 to 1990, inclusive, together with the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" forecast for 1991, the current account payment surplus or deficit expressed as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information requested is as follows:

British Telecommunications (Government Shareholding)

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he proposes to sell the Government's residual shareholding in British Telecommunications plc.

Mr. Maude: As my right hon. Friend announced in his Budget speech on 19 March, the Government intend to sell part of their residual shareholding in BT in the coming year. No decisions have been taken about the precise timing and the number of shares to be sold. We have, however, begun to appoint advisers to certain of the key roles.

Preliminary and main expenses incurred in connection with the sale of shares will be met from receipts from the sale. Parliamentary approval of the expenditure will be sought in a token new estimate in the summer supplementary estimate round. Expenses incurred in advance of the sale will be met by repayable advances from the contingencies fund.

Once the sale is complete and the final costs are known, a supplementary estimate will be presented to provide substantive provision for the main sale expenses of the sale and a compensating increase in appropriations-in-aid. The balance of the receipts will be paid into the consolidated fund.

Crown Property (Rates)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans the Government have for the payment of contributions in lieu of rates on property occupied by the Crown; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maples: My right hon. Friend the former Prime Minister announced on 15 December 1989 at column 834 that responsibility for the valuation of the Government's estates for rating purposes would be transferred to the Inland Revenue valuation office from April 1991. The Government have since decided that, for reasons of efficiency and economy, the other responsibilities of the Rating of Government Property Department should also be transferred to the valuation office. The valuation office is, in consequence, responsible for the payment of contributions in lieu of rates on Government property and recovery from occupying Departments. It is also responsible for payment of rates and diplomatic property as well as for recovery of a portion of the community charge and rates from foreign missions and international organisations.

Taxes

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what proportion of total central Government revenue is raised by corporation tax in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany;

(2) what proportion of total central Government revenue is raised by income tax in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 22 April 1991]: Figures for tax revenues disaggregated by tax for the United Kingdom, France and Germany on a comparable basis are published in "Revenue Statistics of OECD Member Countries" which can be found in the Library.

Food and Drink

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much the United Kingdom's trade in (a) food and (b) drink is forecast to be in deficit in 1991.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 22 April 1991]: The Treasury does not forecast trade balances in food and drink. The Budget forecast is for the overall visible trade deficit to fall from £18 billion in 1990 to £12 billion in 1991.

HEALTH

Water Fluoridation

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the incidence of decayed, missing or filled teeth among 12-year-olds in the South and East Cumbria health authorities' areas; which of the Northern region's 16 authorities had a higher figure; and if he will estimate the reduction which might ensue if South and East Cumbria's whole population received water at optimum fluoride levels, if the response was similar to that over the United Kingdom as a whole where water supplies had been brought to the World Health Organisation's optimum level.

Mr. Dorrell: The most recent survey of caries prevalence conducted for the British Association for the Study of Community Dentistry in 1988-89 showed the following results in the 16 health districts in the northern region:

District	Decayed, missing and filled permanent teeth
South Cumbria	1·82
South Tees	1·80
North Tees	1·64
Northumberland	1·55
East Cumbria	1·53
Darlington	1·39
South Tyneside	1·38

District	Decayed, missing and filled permanent teeth
Durham	1·38
South West Durham	1·36
West Cumbria	1·32
North West Durham	1·32
Sunderland	1·30
North Tyneside	1·25
Newcastle	1·22
Gateshead	0·91
Hartlepool	0·71

In the north-west Durham, Newcastle, Gateshead and Hartlepool districts all 12-year-old schoolchildren are likely to have received fluoridated water at a level of 0·7 parts per million and over since birth. The incidence of decayed, missing or filled teeth in those districts which are similar to other districts where water fluoridation has been introduced at the World Health Organisation optimum level, is an indication how the dental health of schoolchildren in south and east Cumbria could be improved. Hartlepool has the best record in England and Wales.

Salmonella

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the results of the public health laboratory service survey for salmonella in eggs carried out on samples collected from high street outlets during February.

Mr. Dorrell: The public health laboratory service's survey involves the testing of some 43,000 United Kingdom-produced eggs that will be purchased from various retail outlets. It is intended that 15 PHLS laboratories will each test eggs in four seperate months spaced throughout the year, the last being in November. The survey has been structured to include investigation of any seasonal variations that might exist. When the investigation is completed at the end of 1991, the data will be collated and analysed.

Smoking

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the yearly mortality in the United Kingdom attributable to (a) heavy passive smoking and (b) average active smoking.

Mr. Dorrell: The independent scientific committee on smoking and health has concluded that the number of deaths from lung cancer among non-smokers associated with a lifetime's exposure to environmental tobacco smoke might amount to several hundred in the United Kingdom each year. The number of deaths caused by active smoking is estimated at around 110,000 in the United Kingdom each year. This figure represents the death toll for all smokers, but the vast majority of deaths occur among regular smokers with a long-standing history of tobacco use.

Renal Services

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve the coverage and delivery of renal services.

Mr. Dorrell: The planning and provision of renal services is a matter for health authorities to decide, taking into account local needs and priorities.

Cholesterol Testing

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department will establish a national campaign to encourage medical practitioners to test all patients who have high blood pressure for blood cholesterol levels.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 19 April at columns 282-83. Decisions about cholesterol testing will be taken in the light of the outcome of consultations on the Standing Medical Advisory Committee's report.

Health Education Authority

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Health Education Authority/Health Education Council in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Donald Maitland, the chairman of the Health Education Authority, for details.

Policy Objectives

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he is yet in a position to announce his Department's policy objectives for 1991-92.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have agreed a statement of the mission, goals and priorities for my Department for 1991-92 and the following three years. It identifies specific aims for the different areas of the Department's business. The NHS policy board has agreed a separate statement of the strategic goals for the NHS management executive for 1991-92, which flow from those departmental aims. Copies of both statements have been placed in the Library.

Research and Development (NHS)

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for research and development in the NHS following the White Paper "Priorities in Medical Research" and the appointment of his Department's first director of research and development.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am pleased to announce a major initiative for research and development. A new R and D strategy and programme for the NHS will be introduced to provide a firm scientific basis for improving health. It will focus on the introduction of improved methods of health care arising from research and on the cost-effective use of resources.

Because of the importance I attach to the development of a research base for the health service I believe it is important to move towards the use of up to 1·5 per cent. of NHS expenditure to be used for research and development.

The key principles of the R and D strategy are:

1. That research and development is a prerequisite for achieving a cost effective service responsive to changes in health needs and innovation;

2. Accordingly, the NHS should invest at an appropriate level to achieve a coherent R and D Programme;

3. Responsibility for R and D needs to be devolved as far as possible to regional and local level with accountability for performance;

4. A mechanism is required to achieve overall balance and coherence;

5. R and D priorities which merit national rather than purely regional attention need to be set;

6. NHS—university collaboration needs to be ensured as well as close links with the Medical Research Council, charities and industry.

The R and D strategy will have the following main elements:

i. a planned and managed approach by the NHS to health research to provide a scienfic basis for action to improve health;

ii. a new countrywide R and D programme to be carried out by regional health authorities within a national framework;

iii. the setting of national R and D priorities;

iv. the setting up of a Central Research and Development Committee chaired by the Director of Research and Development;

v. a requirement of regional health authorities to prepare, publish, resource, and implement (and be held to account for) research and development plans;

vi. information systems on research outcomes for purchasers and providers of health care, for health policy and planning;

vii. emphasis on practical developments arising from research, the prompt introduction of cost-effective developments into the NHS;

viii. challenging but manageable national and regional expenditure targets;

ix. collaboration with other research funding bodies to address issues of agreed national priority.

An announcement giving further details, including preliminary information about the subject matter and the management arrangements for the programme will be made towards the end of 1991.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Mr. Gerard Clarke

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement in respect of Gerard Clarke, a prisoner in Crumlin Road gaol as to what reason he gave for going on hunger strike at the end of March; and if it is still continuing.

Dr. Mawhinney: Gerard Clarke has been refusing prison food since 27 March and continues to do so. He is protesting about his removal from association with other prisoners under prison rule 25 (Northern Ireland) 1982.

Northern Ireland Electricity

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost of the PJR report on Northern Ireland Electricity; and what was the purpose of the report.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 22 April 1991]: The PJR report cost £52,225. PJR's remit was to examine the appropriateness of management structure of Northern Ireland Electricity in the light of its proposed privatisation.

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how long it usually takes for information to be made publicly available as to whether a driver had taken alcohol before driving and being killed.

The Attorney-General: I have been asked to reply.

Information as to whether a driver had taken alcohol before driving and being killed is made publicly available on the hearing of a coroner's inquest. The time taken to release this information varies and no records are kept.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Regulation and Codification

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from farmers regarding the increase in regulation and codification of agriculture; and what response he has made.

Mr. Curry: I have received no recent representations from farmers regarding the increase in regulation.

Milk

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to support the maintenance of the EC safety net intervention for beef cattle in order to help mitigate the effects of further cuts in milk quotas.

Mr. Curry: We recognise that any cut in milk quotas will increase the volume of beef coming on to the market in the short term. However, we do not believe that it is sensible to turn a high-value product like beef into a low-value product by freezing it for intervention and to build up large stocks which then overhang the market. It is not justifiable to continue provisions which permit uncontrolled access to intervention at prices considerably in excess of the market price. In the negotiations currently in progress we are arguing that dependence on intervention must be reduced, and that strict controls are needed both on the quantity purchased and on the prices paid for it.

Abbatoirs

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many abattoirs in England have gone out of business in the last 12 months.

Mr. Maclean: All abattoirs in England and Wales operate under licences granted by local authorities. With the exception of abattoirs approved for intra-Community trade, records are not routinely maintained on the operational status of individual abattoirs. However, annual statistics derived from state veterinary service visits indicate that numbers of non-export abattoirs in England and Wales dropped from some 720 to around 640 in 1990. Of the abattoirs approved for EC exports, two have ceased trading in the last 12 months. We do not have information on the reasons for closure.

Livestock Production

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on the National Cattle Breeders Association code of practice for livestock production.

Mr. Maclean: We are aware that the association has prepared a code of practice which it is discussing with other farming organisations. We understand that the details have not yet been finalised, but in principle we welcome initiatives by the industry to improve the marketing of British produce.

Livestock Diseases

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements he has made for the continuation of diagnostic analysis for bovine spongiform encephalopthy and other livestock diseases currently being carried out at the veterinary investigation centres he is proposing to close.

Mr. Maclean: The histopathological diagnosis of BSE by the veterinary investigation service is currently organised on a national basis and will not be adversely affected by the closure of veterinary investigation centres. As indicated in the announcement of the outcome of the review, where centres are to be closed diagnostic and other work will be transferred to one of the remaining centres.

Common Agricultural Policy Budget

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to seek an increase in the CAP budget ceiling to allow for the impact on the common agricultural policy of the costs related to eastern Germany.

Mr. Curry: The amended 1991 budget for the common agricultural policy already includes 1,315 mecu—£920 million—to cover increased market support costs arising from German unification and all member states agreed last October that this amount could be accommodated within the guideline. Other factors are now leading to higher than predicted levels of CAP expenditure, but it remains Government policy to seek an agreement on the Commission's 1991 agricultural price proposals that is fully compatible with the guideline.

Growth Promoters

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to ban imports of beef from those countries where testing indicates that the use of hormones and other illegal growth promoters is widespread.

Mr. Maclean The use of growth-promoting hormones in beef production in the European Community is illegal. All imports of beef from third countries must be accompanied by suitable guarantees to the effect that hormones have not been used in their production.

All beef-exporting countries are required to establish a residue testing programme approved by the EC standing veterinary committee and their meat plants are subject to inspection by Commission officials. Testing programme results are then subject to further scrutiny at Community level to ensure that compliance with EC standards is maintained.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to increase the proportion of imported beef which his Department tests for hormones and other illegal growth promoters.

Mr. Maclean: The Ministry already has a very extensive programme of surveillance for veterinary drug residues, including the banned hormones and other illegal growth promoters, and both home-produced and imported meats are covered. None the less, the surveillance programmes are under continuing review and if there is evidence of a particular problem we will of course consider whether the level of monitoring in that area should be increased.

Baby Milk

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the new European directive on baby milk to be adopted; if he will take steps to ensure the retention of the United Kingdom's existing voluntary agreements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Publication of the infant formulae and follow-on formulae directive agreed in Brussels on 15 March 1991 is expected to appear in the Official Journal of the European Communities shortly. The Government will aim to maintain existing arrangements when considering implementation of the directive in United Kingdom law.

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what facilities have been made available for staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Curry: No special facilities have been set up for single donations to the St. John Ambulance Brigade appeal, but anyone who wishes to contribute regularly may do so by using the departmental facilities for payroll giving to charities.

Calf Imports

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to seek limitations by the European Commission on the number of calves being imported into the European Community from eastern Europe.

Mr. Curry: The Commission has already made it clear to the Agriculture Council that it intends to limit the import of calves in 1991 to 425,000 head, the average of the three years 1987-89. Negotiations to this end are in progress with third countries.

Bovine Somatotropin

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects bovine somatotropin to be licensed for commercial use in the United Kingdom; and if he has assessed there to be a socio-economic appraisal of the consequences of the drug's approval.

Mr. Maclean: Under the provisions of Community law, no BST product may be licensed in any member state, before 1 January 1992. No product will be licensed in the United Kingdom thereafter unless our independent scientific advisers tell us that it fully meets all the criteria set down in the Medicines Act and Community legislation. I cannot say when or whether that will happen. The Commission is examining the socio-economic implications of licensing BST and should present a report before October.

Wildlife Poisoning

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place in the Library a copy of his pesticide safety division report into the use of strychnine for the poisoning of wildlife in April 1990 on the Fermor-Hesketh estate.

Mr. Maclean: On 11 April 1990 a dead fox was found at Kirby farm, Pury End, Northants, together with the remains of pigeons and rabbits. As is normal in such incidents, a post mortem examination was carried out by this Department. Laboratory analysis of the stomach contents revealed the presence of a residue of strychnine. Despite detailed inquiries by a departmental investigation officer it has not proved possible to identify who was responsible. The pesticides safety division has not produced a report on the incident.

Agriculture Council

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Luxembourg on 22 and 23 April.

Mr. Gummer: I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting together with my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), Parliamentary Secretary in my Department.

Discussion concentrated on the Commission's proposals for 1991-92 farm prices. I reiterated the United Kingdom position on the lines that I recently explained to the House. Discussion is currently scheduled to resume on 21 May.

WALES

Community Care

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans for the introduction of improved arrangements for community care.

Mr. David Hunt: The phased programme of implementing the reforms of community care in Wales from 1 April 1991 to 1 April 1993 will continue as planned with managing of social services the responsibility of local government.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Public Houses

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any proposals to provide compensation for public house tenants displaced as a result of brewers conforming to the 1989 Tied Estate Orders; what representations he has received; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of beer, the Government introduced the Landlord and Tenant Act 1990 in response to concerns about security of tenure for pub tenants. The Act extends to pub tenants the same protection as other business tenants and for the first time requires brewers to pay statutory compensation to tenants whose pubs are taken back into management. Tenancies entered into after 10 July 1989 are already protected by the Landlord and Tenant Act while those entered into before that date will be protected by July 1992 at the latest. The Government are naturally concerned about current threats by certain national brewers to issue "notices to quit" to tenants who are not yet protected by the Act. We understand that most of these notices will be issued for the purpose of renegotiating the terms of tenancy agreements and will not ultimately lead to evictions.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the total number of public houses which are owned by the regional brewers.

Mr. Redwood: The latest information we have is the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of beer published in March 1989 which found that regional brewers owned just over 7,000 public houses. As a result of the measures introduced in response to that report, in particular the requirement that national brewers should free from ties half their pubs in excess of 2,000, the total number of pubs owned by regional brewers is likely to change. The Director General of Fair Trading will be looking at the number of pubs owned by regional brewers when he conducts his review of the effectiveness of the measures introduced in response to that report in 1993-94.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has of the number of public houses which are currently being put on the market for sale by the major brewers in order to comply with the 1989 Supply of Beer Orders; what representations he has received; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The Supply of Beer (Tied Estate) Order which was introduced in response to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of beer requires the national brewers to release from ties half of the pubs they own in excess of 2,000 by November 1992. As a result, approximately 11,000 pubs will be freed on an industrywide basis. There are a number of ways in which national brewers can do this including leasing free of ties, selling to another brewer or selling to a sitting tenant. The steps so far taken by the national brewers suggest that they are using a mixture of these options to meet the requirement in the order. It is up to each brewer to decide how many premises to sell and how many to lease free of ties and we do not have figures for the total number of pubs which the national brewers currently have on the market. However, the Director General of Fair Trading will be looking at the number of pubs sold by national brewers when he conducts his review of the effectiveness of the measures introduced in response to the MMC report in 1993-94.

Marinas

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to extend the fair trading and monopolies legislation to marinas.

Mr. Redwood: Under the Fair Trading Act 1973 it may in certain circumstances be possible to make a monopoly reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission of services provided by marina owners. I have no plans at present to amend the Fair Trading Act to include special provisions relating to marinas.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish a table showing the volume of manufactured exports, less erratics, each year since 1970, and for each quarter since 1 January 1986, relative to the increase in the volume of manufactured exports in Germany, France, Italy, the United States of America and Japan.

Mr. Sainsbury: A series showing the United Kingdom's volume of exports of manufactured goods, less erratics, is published in table B8 of the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics", which is held in the House of Commons Library. Comparable figures for other countries are not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his estimate of trade-weighted index of competitiveness of United Kingdom exports on 8 October 1990 relative to that of West Germany.

Mr. Sainsbury: Between 1985 and the second half of 1990 the United Kingdom's trade-weighted index of unit labour costs had increased by 5 per cent. compared with a 28 per cent. increase in Germany. Data for trade-weighted unit labour costs are calculated quarterly and are therefore not available for 8 October 1990.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the base year used to get the trade-weighted average index of United Kingdom export competitiveness for manufacturers in the Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics; what is the corresponding International Monetary Fund figure; and whether the International Monetary Fund figure for the United Kindom is based on the weight for the United Kingdom trade with the other 15 countries or the weight of those countries globally.

Mr. Sainsbury: The base year used in the trade-weighted index of unit labour costs, as published in the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics" is 1985. This series is produced by the IMF and hence the base year for the IMF series is the same. The trade weights used to construct the United Kingdom's index of relative unit labour costs are based on the exports, in 1980, to the United Kingdom from the other 16 countries covered.

Paint Exports

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of British paint exports for the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures for 1986 and 1981.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information requested is available in "Overseas Trade Statistics", which is available in the House of Commons Library. Trade in paints is recorded under SITC 533.41-43.

Security Interests

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is in a position to make a statement on his response to part II of the report of Professor A. L. Diamond reviewing the law on security interests in property other than land.

Mr. Lilley: Yes. Professor Diamond's report was published in January 1989. Part II recommended a radical reform of the law on security interests. The recommendations were numerous and covered complex issues where changes to the law could have significant implications for the raising of business finance. We therefore allowed an extended period of public consultation.

A clear majority of those representing interests governed by English law argued against major reform. Reform would be complex and, in view of the proposed registration arrangements, potentially costly to the Government and business. It could be contemplated only if there was a strong commercial justification. That did not emerge from the consultation and I have therefore decided not to accept the recommendations in part II of the report for England and Wales. However, the report served a useful purpose in airing these important issues.

Some of those responding to the consultation supported some limited changes to the law relating to security interests and the acquiring of title to goods and I am giving these suggestions further consideration.

There was, on the other hand, a call for action to facilitate the granting of security interests in Scotland. Scots security law differs from English law in that it is impossible, except in limited circumstances, to create an adequate and workable security over moveable property without the creditor taking possession. Respondees to the consultation argued that this puts Scottish business at a severe disadvantage. This is clearly an issue which needs to be explored further. The Department's Scottish solicitors will therefore prepare a draft of a Bill introducing new forms of security over moveables into Scots law which will form the basis of further public consultation. The draft should be ready for consultation in about 12 months' time.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Facsimile Communications

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Lord President of the Council, further to his answer of 19 February to the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg), Official Report, column 120, what proposals he has for better arrangements for the transmission of facsimile communications for members of the United Kingdom delegation of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and the Assembly of the Western European Union.

Mr. MacGregor: Following the agreement of the House of Commons Commission on 25 March, free direct dialling from the Palace of Westminster to the Council of Europe and the Western European Union is now possible. Guidance issued to Members by the Serjeant at Arms includes details of the transmission of facsimile messages under these new arrangements.

DEFENCE

The Gulf

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the current level of additional allowances paid to RAF personnel at Dhahran;

(2) what changes have occurred to the additional allowances paid to RAF personnel at Dhahran in the last six months;

(3) if he will provide details of all the additional allowances that are currently being paid to service personnel in the Gulf region; and what changes have occurred to those allowances in the last six months.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his current estimate of the total cost arising from British military involvement in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The latest estimate for the additional defence costs, to be spread over several years, is that they are expected to be of the order of £2·5 billion.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide his latest estimate of the cost of military equipment lost and damaged during the Gulf crisis.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The value of major equipments lost and munitions consumed in the conflict and in associated training is currently assessed as approaching £450 million.

Air Electronic Operators

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether new tasks arising from the deployment of new apparatus will be taken into account in revaluating the jobs of air electronic operators;

(2) when the next job evaluation of air electronic operators is to take place;

(3) whether independent scrutiny will be carried out in any future evaluation of the jobs of air electronic operators.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A job evaluation of air electronic operators, involving an independent consultant, is taking place and will take account of all apparatus used in their peacetime role.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many air electronic operators were down-banded arising from the regrading exercise carried out by the joint services job evaluation team in 1989.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A total of 354.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the factor scoring plan in accounting for the operational supervisory roles of air electronic operators; and if he has any plans to revise it.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The factor plan used for all RAF trade groups is considered to be flexible enough to meet the supervisory responsibilities of air electronic operators. It is kept under regular review.

Iraq (Nuclear Weapons)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's current assessment as to when Iraq will be able to produce nuclear weapons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on 12 December 1990, Official Report, column 430.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information his Department has as to the movement of Iraqi safeguarded material out of the nuclear facilities prior to them being attacked by allied forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We do not know whether the Iraqis moved safeguarded material out of the Tuwaitha nuclear research centre near Baghdad prior to the attack by allied forces. The material was inspected by the IAEA in November 1990 and was reportedly all accounted for. Inspections of Iraq's nuclear facilities to be carried out in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolution 687 adopted on 3 April should provide an opportunity to determine the location of the safeguarded material.

Battle Stress

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of service men suffering battle stress; and what contribution his Department is making to deal with this problem.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Casualty figures, our own research and medical reports and information from other sources indicate that the level of battle stress among participants in Operation Granby is modest and manageable. This can be largely attributed to the education programme, the provision of a network of psychiatric support particularly in operational areas and the targeting of extra support to personnel who have been exposed to exceptional stress.

Birmingham Arms Fair

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department is taking part in any way in the forthcoming Birmingham arms fair; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Representatives from my Department will be participating in the defence components and equipment exhibition to be held in Birmingham next month.

Unix Computers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the uses to which the Unix computers, supplied under the contract recently won by ICL, will be put.

Mr. Alan Clark: These machines will be used for a wide range of non-operational, administrative support functions.

Soviet Union (Information Exchange)

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many times in the last two years personnel serving in (a) the Army, (b) the Royal Air Force and (c) the Royal Navy have met their Soviet counterparts to exchange information.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are regular meetings, in both bilateral and multilateral fora, between the United Kingdom armed forces and representatives of the Soviet armed forces, involving all three services. A considerable number of such contacts have already taken place and others are planned. We do not maintain a central record of the number of times members of the three services have met their Soviet counterparts.

Services Accommodation

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans exist for the provision of accommodation for those service personnel and their families who will leave the services as a result of "Options for Change".

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We are continuing to examine ways of meeting the housing needs of service personnel in the light of changing circumstances.

Environmental Improvements (Germany)

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans exist to carry out environmental improvements to the land and buildings currently being used by the British Army of the Rhine and RAF Germany.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There is a continuing programme of improvement works and maintenance on the sites occupied by British forces in Germany. This programme takes into account commitments entered into with the German authorities and Her Majesty's Government's own environmental initiatives.

Service Personnel (Training)

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans exist for the provision of training for those service personnel who will leave the services as a result of "Options for Change".

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 12 June 1990 at columns 142-43 and to that which I gave the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) on 28 March 1991, at columns 568-69.

Direct Fire Weapons Effect System

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the current status of the planned procurement of a direct fire weapons effect system for the British Army;

(2) what companies have expressed an interest in supplying the British Army with a direct fire weapons effect system;

(3) what effect the "Options for Change" study has had upon the planned procurement of a direct fire weapons effect system;

(4) what is the approximate quantity of direct fire weapons effect systems that the British Army will require.

Mr. Alan Clark: Several companies have submitted tenders for the direct fire weapons effect system. These are still being considered. It is not our normal practice to reveal the names of the companies concerned at this stage in a competition. Actual numbers of equipment to be procured are classified, but quantities have been adjusted to take account of "Options for Change".

US Forces

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his United States counterpart regarding the withdrawal of United States forces from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has had a number of discussions with the United States Secretary of Defense on the future of United States forces in this country.

"Options for Change"

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what effect the "Options for Change" study has had on the defence procurement budget to date.

Mr. Alan Clark: I am not in a position to add to my answer to the hon. Gentleman of 19 December last year, at column 212.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which budget vote sub-headings have been affected by the "Options for Change" process; and by what amount.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The effect of "Options for Change" on vote sub-heads will depend on decisions on the final size and shape of the armed forces, which have yet to be taken. Even when decisions are taken, it will not be possible to identify the effects on individual sub-heads without disproportionate effort.

Military Budget

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will place in the Library copies of information on the British military budget to be provided as part of the agreement reached on the Vienna confidence and security-building measures document.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom budget information, in the format specified by the Vienna document, will be placed in the Library when it is released in Vienna.

Weapons (Exchange of Information)

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration has been given to the North Atlantic Assembly's resolution to consider the exchange of information on the production of weapons and equipment.

Mr. Alan Clark: All the resolutions adopted by the North Atlantic Assembly during 1990 have been discussed in the North Atlantic Council and, following normal practice, comments on them forwarded by the NATO Secretary-General to the secretary-general of the assembly.

Tanks

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the suitability of the British Challenger II tank as a replacement for Chieftain tanks.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department is making a full assessment of the suitability of Challenger II as equipment for our future main battle tank fleet.

India (Arms Sales)

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the value of arms sales by British companies to India during 1990.

Mr. Alan Clark: It has been the practice of successive Administrations not to provide such information as it relates to specific countries.

CFE Treaty

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has received from his United States counterpart regarding concerns over Soviet compliance with the conventional forces in Europe treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have been asked to reply.

We continue to be in close touch with the United States and with other allies about our mutual concerns over Soviet compliance with the provisions of the CFE treaty. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister raised these issues personally with Mr. Gorbachev in March. NATO is agreed that it is for the Soviet Union to resolve these concerns.

Military Equipment (Exports)

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his NATO counterparts regarding a possible increase in the export of military equipment resulting from the CFE treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have been asked to reply.

During the negotiations, NATO secured agreement to provisions in the CFE treaty that require any equipment of types limited by the treaty in excess of the treaty limits to be destroyed or converted to non-military use according to internationally agreed procedures.

Conflict Prevention Centre

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what resources he is planning to make available to the conflict prevention centre to be established by the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) on 15 April at column 105.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 25 April 1991

ENVIRONMENT

Solihull Urban District Plan

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will issue guidelines on the release of land concerning the type of houses identified to meet demand in the urban district plan for Solihull.

Mr. Yeo: Solihull's deposited unitary development plan includes a policy on the type of dwellings to be allowed on housing sites with the aim of providing a mix of types of dwellings to cater for different needs.

The Secretary of State's strategic guidance for the West Midlands (PPG10) does not include guidelines on the release of land for different types of houses. He will, however, consider the need for advice on this subject in the forthcoming West Midlands regional guidance.

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the number of houses identified to meet demand and over the next 20 years in the urban district plan for Solihull.

Mr. Yeo: The housing figure of 7,500 included in the Solihull unitary development plan is that recommended in the West Midlands strategic guidance published in February 1988. The Secretary of State does not propose to review that figure, as the guidance provides a policy package for the whole period 1988-2001 and to change any element of it could be prejudicial to the success of the package. Regional guidance for the West Midlands region, which will incorporate a review of strategic guidance, will be produced over the next two to three years, and this will provide an opportunity to assess the effectiveness of the guidance policies and make any necessary changes.

Compulsory Purchase Compensation

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the cost of extending the 10 per cent. addition to compulsory purchase compensation to the compulsory purchase of agricultural land.

Mr. Yeo: Figures relating exclusively to the compulsory acquisition of agricultural land are not collected centrally.

Starter Homes

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what encouragement he has given to an increase in the number of starter homes.

Mr. Yeo: For the most part it is for the building industry to offer homes at a price people can afford. We have asked planning authorities to deal promptly with planning applications and streamlined appeal procedures. We encourage local authorities to make land available for all forms of low-cost home ownership, one aspect of which is our initiative to secure the release of sites for local needs in rural areas. Through the Housing Corporation we have invested nearly £400 million since 1983 in shared ownership schemes, which has brought home ownership within the reach of over 20,000 first-time buyers.

Countryside Stewardship Scheme

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what definition his Department uses for a public good when determining non-financial benefits under the proposed countryside stewardship scheme; and whether it includes the conservation of wildlife and habitats.

Mr. Baldry: It is intended that under the countryside stewardship scheme payments will be made to land managers and farmers to protect and enhance key landscapes and habitats which are valued by the public; and to improve public enjoyment of them through the sensitive provision of access. Benefits to wildlife will be derived from the protection and enhancement of the habitats on which it is dependent.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what organisations he has consulted over the implementation of the countryside stewardship scheme.

Mr. Baldry: The Countryside Commission has been developing countryside stewardship in conjunction with my Department, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Nature Conservancy Council, now English Nature, and English Heritage. Discussion has taken place with a large number of organisations including the British Council for Archaeology, the Council for the Protection of Rural England, the Country Landowners Association, the Farming and Wildlife Trust, the National Farmers Union, the national park authorities, the National Sheep Association, the National Trust, the Open Spaces Society, the Ramblers Association, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, the Royal Society for Nature Conservation, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, the Tenant Farmers Association and the World Wide Fund for Nature UK. There has been substantial correspondence with many others.

Severn Estuary

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has regarding the formal designation as a special protection area under the 1979 EC Wild Birds Directive of the inter-tidal areas on the English bank of the Severn estuary so far proposed for designation by the Nature Conservancy Council.

Mr. Baldry: The Nature Conservancy Council's proposal for the designation of the Severn estuary as a special protection area is under consideration.

Benzene

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps are taken to monitor the levels of benzene in drinking water in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is responsible only for drinking water quality in England. I am, however, answering these questions with the agreement of the Secretary of State for Wales. Drinking water quality in Scotland and Northern Ireland is the responsibility of the respective Secretaries of State.

I am not aware of benzene being found during 1990 in public water supplies in England and Wales.

Benzene is not likely to be found in drinking water except as the result of pollution. If a water company suspected that benzene or other hydrocarbon was present in its supplies it would be required to monitor in accordance with regulation 14 of the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 and as advised in the publication "Guidance on Safeguarding the Quality of Public Water Supplies" issued by the Department of the Environment and the Welsh Office.

Right to Repair Scheme

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the right to repair scheme.

Mr. Yeo: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning on 31 October 1990 to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), Official Report, column 535. The number of claims under the right to repair scheme continues to be low.

Housing Stock

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will produce a table giving, for each of the local authorities that have undertaken large-scale voluntary transfer of their housing stock to other bodies, (a) at the time of the transfer, the local authority's outstanding loan debt on its housing stock, (b) the actual price paid for the transfer, (c) the estimate of right to buy receipts included in the valuation price, (d) the amount of the purchase price used by the local authority to repay debt incurred for local housing purposes, (e) the amount of the receipts so far re-invested in housing improvement or development either (i) with the body purchasing the stock, or (ii) registered housing associations not involved with the purchase, or (iii) other outside bodies, or (iv) by the local authority itself, (f) where such re-investment is with a registered housing association, the amount reclaimed by the local authority from the housing corporation as housing association grant and (g) an estimate of the total number of new dwellings built or planned as a result of the re-investment so far undertaken.

Sir George Young: The table gives the information requested except for (d), (e), (f) and (g). On (d), local authorities must set aside either 75 per cent. of the receipts from large-scale voluntary transfers or whatever is required to cover the debt on the transferred housing up to 100 per cent. of the receipts, whichever is the greater. The exact amounts of the receipts which were used to repay the debts on other housing expenditure are not available centrally. On (f), housing association grant for local authority sponsored schemes is claimed by housing associatitons, not by local authorities. Although the grant is used to repay development loans from local authorities, neither the Housing Corporation nor the Department is in a position to know whether the loans have been funded from voluntary transfer receipts or from other sources. On (e) and (g), local authorities are required to inform the Department of their expenditure, but the proceeds of large-scale voluntary transfers reinvested in local housing are not separately identified.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) on 12 December 1990, Official Report, c. 442. Information relating to financial years 1979-80 to 1984-85, inclusive, is not readily available and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost. The provisional outturn for 1990-91 is £7·9 million and the provisional budget for 1991-92 is £6·6 million; the latter figure excludes PSAs, the Building Research Establishment Agency and the Queen Elizabeth II conference centre where budgets have not yet been finalised.

Plankton

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his response to the conference in Plymouth, on the role of plankton in climate change, at which he was represented.

Mr. Baldry: The symposium on the biological consequences of global warming, held at the polytechnic of the south west, Plymouth, was a scientific meeting at which Government Departments were not represented. The role of plankton in the global carbon cycle is among the topics to be further reviewed by the intergovernmental panel on climate change, for which the United Kingdom continues to lead the scientific assessment under the chairmanship of Dr. John Houghton, chief executive of the Meteorological Office.

Biodiversity Convention

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his response to the policy conclusions of the recent biodiversity convention, at which he was represented.

Mr. Baldry: My Department was represented, along with officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Overseas Development Administration, at a meeting of legal and technical experts on biological diversity convened in March by the United Nations Environment Programme. This was largely concerned with deciding the necessary procedures to enable negotiation of a global convention to begin at the next meeting which will be held in Madrid from 24 June to 3 July.

Halon

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to identify the extent of and need for halon use within the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Under the amendments to the Montreal protocol that were agreed in London last June, the production of halons is to be phased out by 2,000, subject to limited exemptions for essential uses. The parties to the protocol are to agree an initial list of essential uses next year. Halons cause serious damage to the ozone layer, but they are at present widely used for firefighting. In order to establish a clear picture of halon use within the UK my Department has decided to commission a detailed study by C. S. Todd and Associates. This will seek to identify those uses for which substitutes are already available, what can be done to help this substitution, and those uses which appear likely to be essential at present.

Air Pollution

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to issue general guidance to local authorities on procedural and other aspects of the new local authority air pollution control system established under part I of the Environment Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Trippier: We have issued today a set of five guidance notes which are intended to serve as a manual for local authorities on the operation of the new local authority air pollution controls under the Environmental Protection Act, which came into force on 1 April. I also commend the notes to operators of processes which are affected by the controls and to others with an interest in how the new system will work.

The notes are: "Introduction to Part I of the Act," "Authorisations," "Applications and registers," "Interpretation of terms used in process guidance notes," and "Appeals."

A set of the notes has been placed in the Library of the House.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish the results of research into the effects of competitive tendering for local authority services.

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has today published the full report of the first year's research into the impact of competitive tendering under the Local Government Act 1988 which has been carried out for us by the Institute of Local Government Studies. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

The research confirms that competitive tendering has brought about improvements in the efficiency with which services are provided, combined with a renewed emphasis on the quality of service. In particular, it shows in the authorities studied that an average saving of 6 per cent. in the annual value of contracts subject to competitive tendering has been achieved, with savings often accompanied by improvements in service standards; that productivity improvements through manual staff reductions of the order of 17 per cent. to 26 per cent. have been secured in services subject to keenest competition; and that many local authorities are considering the methods and standards of service provision in a much more systematic way.

The research is continuing for a further two years to permit a thoroughgoing analysis of contract performance and developments in local authorities over time.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Conciliation Services

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Attorney-General what provision his Department will be making for funding of family conciliation services in 1991-92.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on 18 April 1991 at column 221.

Arbitration Figures

Mr. Alton: To ask the Attorney-General what representations he has received about the Lord Chancellor's proposals to raise arbitration figures to £1,000 and to include claims for personal injuries in this figure; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I have received no such representations.

My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has, however, received numerous representations both prior to and since the publication of the report of the review body on civil justice (Cm 394), which recommended that the arbitration limit be increased to £1,000. The existing limit of £500 was set in 1981 and the new limit, which will have effect from July 1991, restores the financial level below which cases are automatically referred to arbitration to a realistic level, enabling the small claims procedure to continue to provide an efficient and accessible means of redress for small litigants.

The civil justice review body also found that the cost of legal representation in small personal injury cases was often disproportionate to the amount in issue, and recommended that they be dealt with under the small claims arbitration procedure. The Lord Chancellor has received representation on this issue from the Law Society, the Trades Union Congress and the National Consumer Council. The Lord Chancellor is currently considering the way forward in the light of the civil justice review's recommendation and the representations that have been made.

Court Proceedings

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General what likelihood of success the Director of Public Prosecutions requires before proceeding (a) against a police officer and (b) against a member of the public.

The Attorney-General: When deciding whether or not to prosecute, the code for Crown prosecutors issued by the Director of Public Prosecutions in accordance with section 10 of the Prosecution of Offence Act 1985 stipulates two general criteria for the institution of criminal proceedings. They are, first, that there must be admissible, substantial and reliable evidence to offer a realistic prospect of conviction; and, secondly, that the public interest requires a prosecution.

No distinction is drawn between cases involving police officers and members of the public.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Attorney-General whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by the Lord Chancellor's Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

The Attorney-General: The following tables show the number and location of all new buildings or extensions where construction contracts were let by the Lord Chancellor's Department, and construction commenced, from 1986 to 1990 inclusive, which had contracts each worth (a) between £3 million and £5 million and (b) more than £5 million.

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Watson: To ask the Attorney-General in relation to immigration appeals in Scotland, during the years 1988, 1989 and 1990 how long, on average, was the lapse between the appeal being lodged and the hearing taking place; and what percentage of cases were successful.

The Attorney-General: The immigration appellate authorities do not record details of the average time taken for appeals to come before an adjudicator from the time the appeal is lodged. However, it is estimated that for the period 1988 to 1990, the average time taken for appeals to come before an adjudicator in Scotland from the date the parties indicated readiness to proceed to a hearing was six to eight months.

The IAA do not record details of the percentage of successful cases at individual hearing centres.

THE ARTS

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Tim Renton: During the past five years, the Office of Arts and Libraries has commissioned only one building project, the completion phase of the new British library building at St. Pancras. The anticipated contract value of this project in cash terms is £150 million.

ENERGY

Home Energy Efficiency

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the network installers appointed by the Energy Action Grants Agency to administer the home energy efficiency scheme; and if he will indicate the area covered by each network installer.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have today placed copies of a list of network installers registered under the home energy efficiency scheme in the Library of the House.

I understand that, in the case of Scottish area 14, which covers the highlands, Western Isles, Orkney and Shetland, full coverage has yet to be reached. The Energy Action Grants Agency has had discussions with the registered network installer for that area and will be making proposasls to my Department shortly on how the benefits of the scheme can best be brought to the whole area.

Trawsfynydd Power Station

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the reasons for the shut-down of Trawsfynydd nuclear power station; how long it was out of commission; what was the cost to the nation's power supply; and what was the cost of repair.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The two reactors at Trawsfynydd nuclear power station were shut down by Nuclear Electric plc (NE) at the beginning of February to make adjustments to operate them at a lower coolant gas pressure. This decision was taken in the light of the latest data on the irradiated properties of the steel used in the pressure vessel. Operation at reduced pressure is intended to maintain the very high margins of safety required by the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate.

The NII was kept fully informed of NE's decision and supported the action taken by NE. The reactors will not be restarted without the agreement of the NII.

The commercial flexibilities open to NE and the regional electricity companies mean that this is unlikely to have any effect on the cost of electricity supplies to the RECs, or on the fossil fuel levy.

The cost to NE of adjustments to its reactors is an operational matter for the company.

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what facilities he is making available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department has arrangements which enable staff to contribute by deduction from pay to charities of their choice. It has no plans to provide further facilities for the appeal mentioned by the hon. Member.

Spent Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when plutonium material extracted from spent nuclear fuel in the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield will start to be returned to European customers; whether the plutonium materials will be transported to European destinations by land or sea; which British seaports or airports will be used; and if he will make a statement about current intentions with regard to the transport of plutonium to overseas customers.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: British Nuclear Fuels plc expects to return plutonium extracted from spent fuel in its thermal oxide reprocessing plant to its customers in Europe from the mid-1990s onwards. Plutonium arising from reprocessing in this country is returned to its country of origin or to any other destination only subject to application of safeguards and on receipt of assurances covering peaceful use, physical protection and controls on re-transfer. Its transport must be made in compliance with stringent national and international regulations. I understand that the options for returning the plutonium referred to by the hon. Member are still under consideration.

Domestic Energy Consumption

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the percentage of domestic electricity consumption which is used in lighting, space heating, refrigeration, water heating, washing machines and driers and cooking, respectively.

Mr. Wakeham: An estimated breakdown of domestic electricity consumption by end use for 1986-87 for England and Wales only is given in the table:

	End use Percentage
Lighting	8·9
Space heating	22·2
Water heating	14·2
Cooking	9·3
Kettles	5·3
Washing machines	4·2
Tumble driers	2·2
Refrigerators and freezers	18·9
Television	5·7
Other[1]	10·1
Total	100·0

[1] Other includes irons, dishwashers, vacuum cleaners, hi fi and small electrical appliances.

Source: Electricity Association.

Data for later years are not yet available.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total of fees paid to underwriters and sub-underwriters involved in the flotation of National Power and PowerGen.

Mr. Wakeham: Primary underwriters were not appointed for this flotation. A total of £14·9 million was paid to United Kingdom sub-underwriters and a further £6 million was paid out in commission to overseas underwriters.

Non-fossil Fuel Obligation

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the areas of responsibility of (a) his Department, (b) the Office of Electricity Supply and (c) the Non-Fossil Fuel Purchasing Agency Ltd. in respect of determining the mechanism by which prices are paid to renewable electricity generators under the Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The division of functions under the legislation is set out in my Department's "Renewables Energy Bulletin No. 4", a copy of which I placed in the Library of the House in December. As that explains, responsibility for making arrangements to comply with an order setting a non-fossil fuel obligation lies with the regional electricity companies on which the obligation is placed and for which the Non-Fossil Purchasing Agency Ltd. acts. However, in view of the role of the Director General of Electricity Supply in examining the arrangements made, the NFPA developed its pricing mechanism in close consultation with the Office of Electricity Regulation.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the number of tenders received by the Non-Fossil Fuel Purchasing Agency Ltd. for inclusion within the 1991 renewable tranche for each of (a) wind power, (b) hydro, (c) landfill gas, (d) municipal waste incineration, (e) general industrial waste incineration and (f) others; and what is the total capacity tendered in megawatts for each category.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Non-Fossil Purchasing Agency Ltd. has adopted a competitive tendering procedure for selecting the projects to be contracted under the proposed 1991 Renewables Order. I am unable to publish any details of the bids submitted to the NFPA, since to do so might prejudice this procedure.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Wakeham: The information requested is as follows:

	Television advertising	Newspaper advertising	Radio advertising	Other promotional material
1990-91[1]	0	559	0	1,074
1989-90	0	892	0	1,000

1980-81	1,500	1,590	0	[2]—
1979-80	20	1,280	0	[2]—

[1] Latest forecast; expenditure on the privatisation of the electricity supply industry will be notified to Parliament in the usual way when the figures have been finalised.
[2] Expenditure on other promotional material prior to 1986-87 is not available on a comparable basis.

Detailed decisions on expenditure by media in 1991-92 have not yet been taken.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Wakeham: The Department of Energy has commissioned no new buildings or extensions in the last five years. Expenditure on the Department's new headquarters building over the period 1987-88 to 1989-90 was borne on the Property Services Agency's vote.

Office of Gas Supply

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the annual cost of the Office of Gas Supply and each regional consultative committee since their inception.

Mr. Wakeham: This is a matter for the Director General of Gas Supply and the chairman of the Gas Consumers Council. I also refer the hon. Member to the supply estimates, the Government's expenditure plans within the energy sector and the annual report of the Director General of Gas Supply which were presented to Parliament earlier this year.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all the people he has appointed to serve at the Office of Gas Supply and each regional consultative committee giving the age, address and profession of each such person.

Mr. Wakeham: The Director General of Gas Supply alone is appointed by me. Mr. McKinnon is an accountant by profession.

Office of Electricity Regulation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all the people he has appointed to serve at the Office of Electricity Regulation and to each regional consultation committee, giving the age, address and profession of each such person.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 26 February at columns 448-49.

Energy Research and Development

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what benefits have accrued to the United Kingdom from participation in the European Communities' energy research and development programme 1990 to 1994, to date.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Within the European Communities' third framework programme for research and development, 1990-94, there are three proposed specific research programmes on energy. These are the non-nuclear energies programme (budget 157 million ecus), the nuclear fission safety programme (budget 37 million ecus) and the controlled nuclear fusion programme (budget 458 million ecus).

No benefits have accrued to the United Kingdom from these proposed programmes as they have not yet been adopted by the Council of Ministers.

Office of Energy Regulation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the cost to date of the Office of Electricity Regulation and each regional consultative committee, broken down annually.

Mr. Wakeham: Although this is a matter for the Office of Electricity Regulation, the hon. Member should first look at the paper entitled "Government's Plans Within the Energy Sector 1991-92 to 1993-94", which was presented to the House in February.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, following the recent support expressed for small nuclear power plants by Crown Prince Tupouto' A of Tonga, he will make it his policy to contact the Government of Tonga to assess what export opportunities exist for the United Kingdom nuclear industry to the South Pacific nation.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is Government policy to support British companies in pursuing suitable export opportunities. The staff of the high commission in Tonga keep a close watch on opportunities for United Kingdom businesses. Where appropriate, they will notify exporters of such opportunities. The high commission has noted the Prince's remarks on nuclear power, which were carried in a local magazine, and we await further developments with interest.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list in the Official Report all nuclear incidents in civil nuclear facilities reported to him by (a) the nuclear installations inspectorate and (b) the nuclear operators over the past five years; and what has been the average time lapse between the occurence of a reportable incident and its reportage to his Department over the same period.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by my predecessor, the hon. Memer for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad) to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart), concerning the revised criteria for the reporting of nuclear incidents at civil nuclear installations, in which he stated:

"All such reports are published quarterly by the Health and Safety Executive", and that for all occurrences including more minor occurrences which are not formally reportable under the criteria

"nuclear operators will publish details . . . in weekly or fortnightly site newsletters".—[Official Report, 30 April 1987; Vol. 115, c. 203-4.]

Copies of these reports and individual site newsletters have since this time been made available to the Library of the House.

Following this statement, operators were instructed that all incidents covered by the formal reporting criteria should be reported as soon as practicable, but anyway within 24 hours to this and other interested Departments and the relevant regulatory bodies. I am not aware of any incident which was defined as reportable where the operator has failed to meet this requirement.

International Energy Agencies

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will set out (i) the criteria adopted in the choice of United Kingdom representatives and (ii) the names of all such representatives appointed over the past 10 years to (a) the International Energy Agency in Paris and (b) the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The United Kingdom is usually represented at the governing board of the International Energy Agency (IEA) by the head of the Department of Energy's international unit and at the board of governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) by the head of the Department's atomic energy division.

The UK is represented in the full range of IEA and IAEA committees and working groups by those with expertise in the relevant areas, including those from UK permanent missions to these organisations. To identify all officials involved over the past 10 years would involve disporportionate cost.

The Department's Permanent Under-Secretary is currently chairman of the governing board of the IEA at official level, having been elected to that post by member countries' governing board representatives.

Symposium on Electricity and the Environment

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representation the United Kingdom will have at the Helsinki symposium on electricity and the environment to be held in Finland on 13 to 17 May; what criteria were adopted to make the choice of representatives; and with whom his Department plans to liaise in distributing details of its outcome.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The symposium will cover technical, economic, environmental and regulatory aspects of electricity supply. The Department of Energy will be represented by two officials, at grade 5 level, from the energy technology and economics and statistics divisions; a deputy chief inspector from Her Majesty's pollution inspectorate will also attend. The responsibility for distributing details of the outcome of the symposium will lie with the sponsors.

Chernobyl

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what steps have been taken since the Chernobyl nuclear accident to review and improve the civil emergency plans and regulations, as they concern civil radiation emergencies.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Following the Chernobyl nuclear accident, the lessons of the accident for the United Kingdom were carefully considered by a Government working group. As part of this review the Department of Energy carried out extensive consultations with emergency services and authorities which would be involved in dealing with a nuclear accident in the United Kingdom. These consultations showed that in addition to the emergency plans which nuclear operators are required to maintain, other contingency plans were available which, as the then Prime Minister stated;

"would permit an effective response to be made to any nuclear accident, including those with more widespread effects than the specific site and off-site plans are designed to cater for."—[Official Report, 12 December 1988; Vol. 144, c.391.]

In addition, following that review, my Department set up a nuclear emergency planning liaison group which meets twice each year with the aim of agreeing improvements in emergency planning arrangements and procedures among interested organisations at national and local level. There have also been improvements in the information available about emergency arrangements with the publication in May 1990 of the Health and Safety Executive's booklet "Arrangements for Responding to Nuclear Emergencies" and the preparation by nuclear operators and local authorities of booklets describing emergency plans and telling the public in the area of nuclear sites what action they should take if a nuclear emergency is declared. In addition, arrangements for the regular exercising of emergency plans have been improved.

More recently the report of Michael Barnes QC into the application for planning consent for the construction of a PWR at Hinkley Point contained a number of recommendations designed to strengthen emergency arrangements around the Hinkley Point site and at national level. These recommendations were endorsed by my right hon. Friend in his decision letter and are being taken forward by my Department, the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate and other bodies concerned.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment has been made of the effect the increase in the United Kingdom's trade-weighted relative unit values since the second half of 1983 has had on the balance of trade in manufacturing.

Mr. Sainsbury: None.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish a table showing for each year since 1961 the percentage increase in the volume of output and the volume of imports of consumer goods other than food and fuel together with the International Monetary Fund or other index of competitiveness.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

Information from which percentage changes in import volumes and import price competitiveness may be derived can be found in tables C14 and F3 of the monthly review of external trade statistics and its annual supplement, available from the Library of the House, or on the Central Statistical Office database which may be accessed through the Library. The information is not available for years prior to 1971. Information about percentage changes in the volume of output of consumer goods as defined could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Businesses (London)

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many businesses (a) opened up and (b) went into receivership in each of the last five years in (i) the London borough of Southwark, (ii) south London and (iii) Greater London.

Mr. Redwood: Information is not readily available in the form requested. The following table gives estimates of the number of companies whose registered offices are in the areas shown.

	London borough of Southwark	South London	Greater London
Companies incorporated in financial year 1990-91	650	5,360	41,000
Active companies on register at 31 March 1991	6,600	53,500	330,000
Of which: in receivership	87	259	2,647

It should be noted that the location of companies in receivership may depend on the location of the offices which carry out receivership duties, and that some companies have been in receivership for a number of years.

South London consists of the London boroughs of Bexley, Bromley, Croydon, Greenwich, Kingston upon Thames, Lambeth, Lewisham, Merton, Southwark, Sutton and Wandsworth.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Biology

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it a requirement of the biology national curriculum that it includes full and accurate information about the female reproductive organs.

Mr. Eggar: The programmes of study for science in the national curriculum set out what is to be taught to pupils from age five to 16. For children aged seven to 11, the programmes of study state that "they should be introduced to the functions of the major organ systems and to basic ideas about the processes of breathing, circulation, growth and reproduction."

For pupils aged 11 to 14, the requirement is that "they should study life processes, food and feeding, respiration, movement, behaviour, growth and reproduction, particularly as they relate to human beings."

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Eggar: The expenditure figures for advertising and other promotional materials by this Department for the financial years 1979-80 to 1990-91 are provided in the table. The 1991-92 estimated budget is £5·38 million. Final decisions on media have not been taken.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list the number of location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Eggar: The Department of Education and Science has not commissioned any buildings in either category. The Department is, however, paying for the fitting out of Sanctuary Buildings which is leased to Property Holdings for use as the Department's headquarters. The cost of the fitting-out works exceeds £5 million. The work is due for completion later this year.

Environmental Education

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report all (i) in-service training and (ii) first offer courses on environmental protection and management currently offered by British universities, polytechnics or colleges of higher and further education, of which his Department is currently aware; and whether he has any plans to extend support for environmental education.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Department does not at present maintain a list of the environmental courses currently available in higher and further education. The priority to be given to such courses is for individual institutions to determine, in the light of demand and within the resources available to them. The Government are, however, proposing to establish an expert committee to make recommendations on the future development of environmental provision within further and higher education.

Shakespeare

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what initiatives he intends to take to encourage the teaching of the works of Shakespeare in schools.

Mr. Eggar: The national curriculum for English specifically requires schools to introduce all pupils aged 11 to 16 to some of the works of Shakespeare. This will extend the opportunities for pupils to study and appreciate Shakespeare's plays.

Children in Hospital

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to educate children who are in hospital in London, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: It is for local education authorities to make provision for the education of children in hospital.

Development Organisations

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any decisions were taken at the 17th Annual General Assembly of European non-governmental development organisations in Brussels, 9-11 April, that affect the present funding of United Kingdom non-governmental development organisations by his Department.

Mrs. Chalker: No decisions were taken at the 17th annual general assembly of European non-governmental development organisations in Brussels, 9-11 April, which affect the present funding of United Kingdom non-governmental development organisations by my Department. The level of funding, which has increased substantially over the last few years, is constantly under review.

Global Environment

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what matters in regard to financial support for protecting the global environment will be discussed at the meeting of G7 Finance Ministers in Washington on 28 April.

Mrs. Chalker: A number of important issues will be discussed at the G7 Finance Ministers meeting in Washington, but it is not possible to forecast how discussions will develop. Environment will be discussed at the development committee meeting on 29-30 April and there will be a meeting of the global environment facility on 1 and 2 May. The United Kingdom has pledged approximately £40 milion to the core facility plus £8 million for the programme to phase out CFCs.

EMPLOYMENT

Bradford TEC

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what criteria were set for Bradford TEC for training needs in 1991-92; what targets have been set; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The training needs identified by Bradford and District TEC are based on a thorough assessment of the local labour market. Their plans include challenging targets which have been agreed with my Department covering a range of training and enterprise activifles. Bradford and District TEC has developed a number of interesting initiatives, including Jobsmatch 1000. The aim of the initiative is to help 1,000 unemployed people in inner city areas to obtain a job within two years.

Employment, South Derbyshire

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in South Derbyshire were employed in (i) 1980, (ii) 1985 and (iii) latest figures; and what is the rate of change of employment in South Derbyshire and the national average over the same period.

Mr. Jackson: The available information for South Derbyshire is from censuses of employment held in 1981, 1984, 1987 and 1989. Data for the constituency and comparable figures for Great Britain are given in the table. The figures relate only to employees in employment; they exclude the self-employed and members of HM Forces.

The figures for 1986-87, 1987-88, 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91 are as follows:

	Television	Press/Radio	Other promotional
1986-87	9·3	3·0	4·1
1987-88	3·3	0·8	2·8

All the above figures refer only to Department of Employment expenditure. They do not cover expenditure by the former Training Agency, Training Commission and Manpower Services Commission. Figures for these are being provided to the hon. Member in reply to a separate question.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Jackson: My Department has commissioned the following new buildings and extensions:

Mr. Forth: The English tourist board, which is grant-aided by my Department, will allocate a subvention of £403,300 to the North West tourist board, which covers Southport, during the 1991-92 financial year. This subvention may be supplemented during the year by additional sums from central funds held by the ETB.

Southport will benefit from the various marketing and development initiatives undertaken by the North West tourist board, including the board's new coastal corridor initiative.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will visit Southport to look at the local tourist industry.

Mr. Forth: My noble Friend Viscount Ullswater, who has ministerial responsibility for tourism matters, recently met a delegation of representatives of resorts in the North West, including Southport. He also hopes to include Southport in his forthcoming extensive programme of regional visits.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Training Agency/Manpower Services Commission in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 24 April 1991]: There were no fees paid to organisations in furtherance of privatisation by the Training Agency or Manpower Services Commission in the financial period from 1979-80 to 1987-88 inclusive.

Fees to the value of £525,000 were incurred in 1988-89, to the value of £613,000 in 1989-90, and £622,000 in 1990-91. These figures are inclusive of expenses plus VAT.

There is no current privatisation being undertaken, although an outstanding invoice for £30,000 will be paid in the current financial year.

NATIONAL FINANCE

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make facilities available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There are no such plans to make special arrangements for this appeal. The Treasury has in the past publicised to staff the arrangements for payroll giving for charity, and I shall be drawing staff's attention to these general arrangements again in due course.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the fall in the profitability of exports of manufactures since 1 January 1990 as a return on sales; and whether he will publish a table comparing the reduction in profitability with the increase in export unit values, the increase in producer input and output prices and the increase in consumer prices.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the profit margins of manufactured exports is not available. Information on the relative profitability of manufactured exports and domestic sales, and on producers' input and output prices, is available on the CSO database, which can be accessed through the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing (a) the value of March output of the manufacturing sector, less food, drink and tobacco, calculated on the basis of note 1 of the notes to editors in CSO press notice CSO (91)51, dated 16 April, on producer prices, (b) the ratio of the input to the output, (c) the proportion of the input assumed to be imported and (d) the price index for the imported and the home-produced import components; and if he will provide corresponding figures for 1970, 1979 and 1985.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is either not available or not readily so for the periods given. Some information relating to parts (a) and (b) is available for 1984, the year on which the weights for the producer price indices are currently based. The value of sales of the manufacturing sector, less food, drink and tobacco, on a net sector basis was about £60 billion. The value of inputs on a net sector basis to the manufacturing sector less food, drink and tobacco (excluding some imported semi-manufactured goods not covered by the incides) was around two fifths of the net output value.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing the actual figures, at the respective dates, which underlie the chart in CSO press notice CSO (91) 51 dated 16 April 1991, on producer prices together with the corresponding figures from January 1970 together with the IMF index of relative export unit values and the relative DTI export unit value for the United Kingdom relative to that of West Germany; and whether he will publish a corresponding table for manufacturing, less food, drink and tobacco.

Mr. Mellor: The figures underlying the chart in CSO press notice CSO (91) 51 are shown in annex B to that press notice for 1988 onwards. Comparable data are only available back to January 1974 and are published in the CSO database accessible through the House of Commons Library.

The DTI index of relative export values of manufactures is published in "Economic Trends", available in the House of Commons Library. The IMF indices of relative export values for the United Kingdom and Germany are given in the following table. (The definition of manufacturing used by the IMF excludes food, drink and tobacco).

Inland Revenue Offices, Nottingham

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates have been received for the heating of the proposed new Inland Revenue offices in Nottingham by electricity; and what estimate has been made for heating them from the combined heat and power system operated by British Coal, Nottinghamshire county council and Nottinghamshire city council.

Mr. Maude: The estimates obtained for the heating of the proposed new Inland Revenue offices in Nottingham by electricity showed installation costs of £1·056 million and annual fuel and maintenance costs of about £97,000. The estimates for heating the offices by the combined heat and power system were £2·16 million for the installation and about £41,000 for annual fuel and maintenance costs.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by the Treasury, the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Maude: My Departments have commissioned buildings:

The Treasury has not let any major contracts for building or extension work in the last five years.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the total annual income of local government in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany is raised through local taxation.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 22 April 1991]: Comparative figures for the income received by local government are published in "OECD National Accounts 1976-88" (volume II). The balance of taxation will be affected by, among other things, the different constitutional position of local authorities, and different allocation of functions to local government, in the different countries.

HEALTH

Hospital Admissions

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to recommend to health authorities a system of booked admissions to hospitals to replace waiting lists for operations; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department has long recommended that health authorities use booked admissions wherever possible. Currently, 17 per cent. of patients waiting for admission have a firm date booked for their treatment. The South Western regional health authority is developing a region-wide admissions booking system. The Department and health regions are following progress with great interest with a view to wider application in the NHS.

Project 2000

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any additional schools of nursing have been approved to implement Project 2000 nurse training.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I announced on 9 January that £71 million was to be made available for Project 2000 in 1991-92. I am now pleased to be able to announce that agreement has been given today to the implementation of Project 2000 in 14 colleges of nursing during 1991-92, subject to the necessary educational approval being obtained from the English national board and the resolution of any outstanding financial and manpower issues.

This will mean that, by the end of the current financial year, over half the colleges of nursing in England will have been approved for Project 2000.

The Project 2000 implementation group has approved the following schemes for a 1991-92 start:

1. Northern RHA—Darlington, Durham, West Durham
2. Yorkshire RHA—York and Scarborough
3. Trent RHA—Leicestershire
4. East Anglia RHA—Cambridge
5. NW Thames RHA—Barnet
6. SE Thames RHA—Dartford, Gravesend, Bexley and Greenwich
7. SW Thames RHA—Kingston and Epsom
8. Wessex RHA—East and West Dorset, Salisbury
9. Oxford RHA—Aylesbury Vale and Wycombe
10. South Western RHA—Gloucestershire
11. Mersey RHA—St Helens and Knowsley, Warrington, Halton

In addition, the following three schemes have already received advance approval for a 1991-92 start:

12. NE Thames RHA—City and Hackney
13. West Midlands RHA—Shropshire, Mid Staffordshire
14. North Western RHA—Stockport, Glossop and Tameside

Financial allocations for the new schemes will be notified as soon as possible, following discussions with the authorities concerned. I shall then consider, in the light of further advice from the implementation group, how any balance of the money provided for Project 2000 should be allocated. I shall make a further announcement as soon as possible.

Project 2000 represents an important development in nurse education in this country. It gives more weight to the process of learning and less to the sharing of the work load in hospital wards, although the training remains practical and patient-orientated.

Electoral Statistics (1991)

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when local government and parliamentary electoral statistics for 1991 will be available.

Mr. Dorrell: Local government electorate statistics are being published by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys in Monitor EL 91/1 today, a week before the local elections. These data are now being reassembled by parliamentary constituency. Statistics in the latter form will be placed in the Library by 10 May, prior to publication in "Electoral Statistics, 1991" (Series EL no. 18) during the summer.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the last five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department does not directly commission new buildings or extensions. It occupies buildings on the common user estate provided and administered by the Department of Environment.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 is not available in the form requested.

Disabled People

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representation his hon. Friend the Minister of Health has received from the Act Now Group concerning Government policy of non-implementation of sections of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have received a letter from this group expressing concern at our decision not to implement sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Act at the present time. Act Now also wrote to officials in the the Department following the announcement that we did not at present intend to proceed with the implementation of section 7.

Opticians

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many opticians are currently registered in England; and what was the figure in March 1989.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Figures on the numbers of opticians in contract with family health services authorities in England are collected by calendar year. The number of opticians in contract with English FHSAs at 31 December 1989 was 6,299 of which 5,515 were ophthalmic opticians and 784 were ophthalmic medical practitioners. The figures for 31 December 1990 should be available in the summer.

Optical Appliances

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people qualified for financial assistance towards the cost of optical appliances in each year since 1979.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Figures are not available prior to 1986-87, when the NHS spectacle voucher scheme was introduced. The table gives details of the numbers of spectacle vouchers redeemed in England and Wales from 1986-87.

Financial Years	Vouchers redeemed (millions)
1986-87	2·471
1987-88	2·704
1988-89	2·417
1989-90	2·422

Vasectomy and Sterilisation

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of provision of vasectomy and sterilisation operations he requires of individual health authorities.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Health authorities were advised in guidance contained in the 1974 memorandum of guidance on family planning (HSC(IS)32), which is still current, that male and female sterilisation operations should be available under the national health service both for family planning and medical reasons, a copy of which is available in the Library. The priority given to these operations generally is a matter for health authorities to determine in the light of clinical judgment and local needs and circumstances.

Spectacle Frames

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assistance is available to individuals suffering from metal allergies who need to purchase specially produced non-metallic spectacle frames.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: People who are eligible for help with the cost of spectacles receive a spectacle voucher which they can use to purchase spectacles which have either metallic or non-metallic frames. Non-metallic frames tend to be cheaper than the metallic variety.

PRIME MINISTER

Q6. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his recent meeting with President de Klerk of South Africa.

Disabled People

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to reply to the letter dated 27 March from the hon. Member for Monklands West, concerning the Government's policy of non-implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

The Prime Minister: I replied to the hon. Member on 22 April 1991.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Prime Minister what representation he has received from the Act Now Group concerning the Government policy of non-implementation of sections of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and how he has responded.

The Prime Minister: The Act Now Group and I have corresponded.

Haemophiliacs

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Prime Minister what steps are taken to ensure parity of treatment for haemophiliacs in Scotland and Wales so far as factor 8 is concerned.

The Prime Minister: The prescribing of factor 8 in the treatment of haemophiliacs is a matter for the individual clinicians concerned. Both Scottish and Welsh patients have equal access to the treatment deemed appropriate.

Building Works

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Prime Minister whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by the Cabinet Office in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

The Prime Minister: The Cabinet Office has not commissioned any new buildings or extensions in the last five years which had contracts worth more than £3 million.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister whether the issue of South Africa signing the nuclear non-proliferation treaty was discussed in his meeting with President De Klerk of South Africa in London on 27 April.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Chernobyl

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will set out the compensation received by the United Kingdom from (a) the Soviet Union and (b) any other relevant international authority to cover the financial losses incurred by United Kingdom farmers and tourist trade businesses in Scotland, Cumbria, Northern Ireland and North Wales as a result of the Chernobyl nuclear accident in the Soviet Union.

The Prime Minister: No compensation has been paid to the United Kingdom for damage suffered following the Chernobyl accident. The Soviet Union is not a party to the international conventions on third party liability for nuclear damage.

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will propose the creation of safe havens for Shias in southern Iraq.

The Prime Minister: We are concerned for the welfare of all Iraqis. We understand that the International Red Cross and the United Nations High Commission for Refugees are ready to take over responsibility for refugees in those parts of southern Iraq presently occupied by coalition forces. The United Nations Iraq/Kuwait observer mission is being deployed to the border. Our contribution of some £20 million to the UN Secretary-General's and other international appeals is for the humanitarian need of all Iraqis. We are in touch with both the Kuwaiti and Saudi Governments about access for Iraqi refugees to their countries.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 25 April.

The Prime Minister: This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with Ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Prime Minister's Office in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 24 April 1991]: No expenditure has been incurred by the Prime Minister's office on fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation since 1979-80, and none is planned for 1991-92.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Total expenditure by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on advertising and other promotional material for the years 1979-80 to 1989-90, latest estimates for 1990-91 and budget provisions for 1991-92 are:

	FCO (Diplomatic wing)	FCO (ODA wing)
1979-80	100,266	214,739
1980-81	116,532	145,697
1981-82	162,998	207,964
1982-83	229,711	135,506
1983-84	205,247	252,691
1984-85	149,932	234,050
1985-86	160,535	271,084
1986-87	335,754	228,347
1987-88	195,000	351,000
1988-89	289,184	689,631
1989-90	395,842	1,066,447
1990-91	926,610	902,000
1991-92	540,204	1,031,000

A disaggregation of these figures to identify the medium used cannot be produced without incurring disproportionate costs.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the last five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My Department has commissioned buildings:

Year of Commencement	Location
	£3-5 million
1985-86	Amman
1985-86	Warsaw
1986-87	Vienna
1989-90	Wellington
1989-90	Seoul
1989-90	Prague
	Over £5 million
1986-87	Kuala Lumpur
1987-88	Helsinki
1989-90	Dhaka
1990-91	Hanslope Park, Bucks

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives he intends to take to protect Shias in southern Iraq.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are concerned for the welfare of all Iraqis. We understand that the ICRC and the UNHCR are ready to take over responsibility for refugees in those parts of southern Iraq presently occupied by coalition forces. The UN Iraq/Kuwait observer mission is being deployed to the border. Our contribution of some £20 million to the UN Secretary-General's and other international appeals is for the humanitarian needs of all Iraqis. We are in touch with both the Kuwaiti and Saudi Governments about access for Iraqi refugees to their countries.

South Africa

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the objectives of British foreign policy in South Africa; and what progress Her Majesty's Government are making towards those objectives.

Mrs. Chalker: The objectives of British foreign policy in South Africa are to encourage the creation of a democratic, non-racial, society through negotiations leading to peaceful change. Significant progress towards fulfilling this objective is being achieved.

TRANSPORT

M6

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the extent to which the recent roadworks at the M6 Farleton interchange and on the connecting Kendal link road were carried out without avoidable disruption to traffic flows.

Mr. Chope: A number of different maintenance activities were identified as essential at the interchange. An assessment showed that adopting a road closure option which lasted three weeks and enabled all the works to be completed, was preferable to a series of road closures, lane closures and contraflows over nine months. The traffic management arrangements adopted were considered the most appropriate for the safe and efficient progress of the works with the least disruption to road users. The proposals were extensively publicised.

M62

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to evaluate the safety and cost-effectiveness of the wire rope safety fence technology in use on the central reservation of the M62 in West Yorkshire.

Mr. Chope: A two-rope design of wire rope safety fence has been safely and successfully deployed on 10 km of the M62 since 1971. During the last 18 months, some of this fence has been replaced with an enhanced four-rope design of wire rope safety fence which has been developed by industry.

Prior to the Department adopting this new enhanced design of fence in December 1988, a full assessment was undertaken. This indicated a satisfactory vehicle impact performance together with likely competitive costings for initial installation and future repair and maintenance.

I will write to the hon. Member giving fuller details of the development and use of wire rope safety fencing in the United Kingdom.

Exhaust Emissions

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received representations concerning the number of cars likely to fail the revised MOT due to unacceptable exhaust emissions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The majority of representations offered strong support for the check. At present, some 40 per cent. of cars fail annual MOT tests, and this percentage will probably increase following the introduction of the emissions check. But the number of cars which actually fail will depend upon how many motorists have their engine tuning checked before the MOT test.

North Devon Link Road

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will approve the siting of a sign reading Exmoor market town at the South Molton exit to the North Devon link road (A361).

Mr. Chope: No, although signs indicating the availability of local services in South Molton are shortly to be erected on the link road. Signs need to be restricted to giving essential information quickly and succinctly and descriptive terms or area wide designations are not therefore appropriate.

Road Accidents

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will provide information about blood alcohol content distributions for fatally injured drivers by sex for the last five years.

Mr. Chope: The information is as follows:

Blood alcohol level in mg per 100ml of blood for fatally injured drivers and riders by sex: GB: 1985-89

	Percentage in each band

Notes:
1. These figures are based on police and coroners' returns to the Department and are incomplete covering only about two out of every three driver or rider casualties.
2. Only drivers and riders aged 16 or over who die within 12 hours of their accident are included.
3. Results for 1989 are provisional.

Drunken Drivers (Retraining)

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that only Department of Transport approved driving instructors will be allowed to undertake the retraining of convicted drunken drivers.

Mr. Chope: There are no proposals to change the existing requirement that driving instruction, for which payment is made, can only be given by a person who is registered or licensed to do so. Our proposals for an experiment in the use of rehabilitation courses for drink-drivers are set out in the Road Traffic Bill. Courses will have to be approved by the Secretary of State. Their main aim is to educate offenders about the effects of drinking and driving. Provision will not be restricted to driving instructors as courses will not normally involve driving lessons.

Organ Donor Cards

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether an organ donor card could be included with current driving licences; and whether there is any EC directive on the subject.

Mr. Chope: Organ donor cards are issued by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, Swansea, with full and provisional driving licences. There is no EC directive on organ donor cards.

Wheel Clamping

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State of Transport what plans he has to introduce legislation to control the actions of private wheel clamping companies.

Mr. Chope: None at present, but I am keeping the situation under review.

M65

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when contracts for the construction of the Blackburn to M6/M61 section of the M65 will be let; when work will start; and when it is due to be completed; (2) if he will make a statement as to any outstanding legal or public expenditure processes which will have to be completed before contracts for the Blackburn to M6/M61 section of the M65 are let.

Mr. Chope: The route of the new motorway is fixed. Proposals for the consequential alterations to other highways and means of access were published last month. We expect to publish the Order for compulsory purchase of land this summer. A period will be allowed for objections and comment. A public inquiry will be necessary if there are objections.

Subject to the successful outcome of any inquiry and the availability of funds work could start in Spring 1993. The new road will take three years to build.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. McLoughlin: The spending by my Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year and the estimated spending in 1990-91 are as follows:

	Television £'000s	Radio £'000s	Newspaper £'000s	Other £'000s
1979-80	4,141	62	105	1,532
1980-81	3,502	336	129	1,737
1981-82	3,615	6	410	1,457
1982-83	2,319	98	816	1,415
1983-84	4,655	22	334	1,488
1984-85	1,723	207	476	2,873
1985-86	70	858	834	4,026
1986-87	72	520	738	4,489
1987-88	2,310	50	140	3,010
1988-89	1,867	110	365	3,367
1989-90	1,930	233	982	3,289
1990-91	3,122	145	833	3,962

Detailed decisions have not yet been taken on expenditure by media for 1991-92, but the overall figure is expected to be approximately £10 million.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. McLoughlin: None since 1989-90. Before that, the Property Services Agency was responsible for expenditure on major new buildings.

Glasgow-Paris (Channel Tunnel Link)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to when direct passenger trains will start to run, through the channel tunnel, between Glasgow and Paris.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave on 24 April to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) at column 450.

Clifton Bypass

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce his decision on the A453 Clifton bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: As soon as possible.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what date he received the detailed study on the A453 Clifton bypass, Nottingham.

Mr. Chope: I received a supplementary report from the landscape advisory committee on 22 April. The committee has reinspected all the route options for the A453 Clifton improvement, and I am urgently considering its report in the light of other views expressed during public consultation.

A13 (Water Main)

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the incidents which took place on the A13 involving the fracturing of a water main on Thursday, 18 April and of a gas mains pipe on Friday, 19 April by the contractor employed by his Department; what investigations were made regarding the competence of this company before they were given the contract; and what compensation will be made to the London borough of Tower Hamlets for the emergency work carried out to rectify the problem.

Mr. Chope: The Department is undertaking a review of the incidents that took place. The contractor is a public company which has been used by the Department on numerous trunk road and motorway schemes over many years. The normal practice on schemes of this nature is for information to be obtained from statutory undertakers on the location of their services, which is passed on to the contractors who have a responsibility for checking locations once on site.

Apportionment of financial responsibility must await the outcome of the review.

Accidents (Motorways)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of accidents at motorway repair and maintenance sites since 1986 have been attributed to (a) drivers' vision being impaired by badly sited or excessively bright temporary lighting, (b) excessive speed or (c) inadequate driving warning.

Mr. Chope: The information requested is not available. The Department has awarded a research contract into safety of major motorway roadworks sites, which will include an examination of ways of reducing accidents.

Vehicle Testing Stations

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are taken by his Department to monitor the performance of individual vehicle testing stations.

Mr. Chope: MOT testing stations are authorised only if the examiner is of good repute and provides the required level of premises and equipment. All testers must attend a course run by the vehicle inspectorate and pass a test of competence. Performance of testing stations is monitored by regular inspections by the vehicle inspectorate, at least once a year and more frequently if sub-standard performance is suspected. Motorists have a right of appeal against the refusal of a testing station to issue a test certificate. The vehicle inspectorate also makes incognito visits to testing stations; follows up complaints about stations; and checks vehicles at the roadside. Sub-standard performance can and does result in withdrawal of authorisation to test.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if individual vehicle testing stations are permitted to sell vehicles that they themselves have tested.

Mr. Chope: Yes.

Docklands Light Railway (Collision)

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the collision of two trains on the docklands light railway on 22 April and its implications for the safety of the public.

Mr. Freeman: The Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate has reported that there was a sideways collision between two trains which converged at a junction on the northern approach to West India Quay station at approximately 7.20 am. A train arriving from Stratford struck the leading coach of a train from Tower Gateway. The latter train was under manual control due to a trackside equipment failure at Westferry station.

This was a low-speed collision, and I was glad to learn that no serious injuries were sustained.

Docklands light railway is urgently investigating the accident. Until the cause is established, and any necessary remedial action taken, additional controls have been implemented to strengthen the existing procedure for emergency manual operation.

I have asked the railway inspectorate to keep me informed of developments.

Signalling Failure (Aberdeen)

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the report by British Rail dated 25 March into a signalling failure at Aberdeen railway station.

Mr. McLoughlin: The report is part of BR's internal inquiry into the derailment of a train at Aberdeen station on 5 February. HM railway inspectorate was notified of the accident and will consider the results of BR's inquiry. Meanwhile, BR has taken action to avoid a recurrence.

Exter-Plymouth Roads

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his current intention on the appointment of consultants to undertake an assessment of the future road needs between Exeter and Plymouth, including the possibility of a new route; when an announcement can be expected; and what have been the reasons for changes in his policy on this matter.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 24 April 1991]: We will be inviting bids from consultants later this year for the study of the needs of the A38 from Exeter to Plymouth. This will be linked with studies into the planning and environmental issues pertaining to the proposal for a privately financed second Tamar crossing, which will also commence shortly.

Motorway Tolls

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research his Department has commissioned or organised into the comparison of traffic flows between a freely available motorway and a toll road; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 24 April 1991]: To assist in modelling the traffic that would use a tolled Birmingham northern relief road, last year the Department undertook a study jointly with the bidders to assess the value which road users in the area placed on saving time.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Health and Social Services Councils

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the names and addresses of the members of the four new health and social services councils excepting those nominated by district councils.

Mr. Hanley: The names of the chairmen of the health and social services councils are as follows:

Mrs. Patricia Stout, Eastern
Mr. Robert Pinkerton, Northern
Mrs. Fionnuala Cook, Southern
Mr Francis Hughes, Western

Nominations for membership of the councils have been invited from district councils, voluntary and community groups and other interested groups and individuals. It is hoped to announce the names of the members shortly.

Chernobyl

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the area in acres and hectares, the number of sheep, and the number of farms currently under restriction, including the county or counties involved, as a result of the radioactive contamination following the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. Hanley: The information is as follows:

Area under restriction	Glenshane, Co Londonderry	Belraugh, Co Londonderry	Glenwherry, Co Antrim	Total
Acres	10,497	1,305	8,620	20,422
Hectares	4,251	528	3,491	8,270
Estimated number of breeding sheep	13,400	1,250	7,000	21,650
Number of farms	79	11	31	121

Clenbuterol

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons have been found guilty of possession of clenbuterol; how many prosecutions are pending; how much clenbuterol has been seized this year; and if he will make a statement about measures to prohibit the movement of clenbuterol across the border from the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: Two persons have been successfully prosecuted for the illegal administration of clenbuterol to cattle and three further prosecutions are pending. Thirteen kilos of the substance in powder form have been seized this year. The importation of unlicensed products such as clenbuterol into the United Kingdom is illegal. Inspectors of the Department of Health and Social Services work closely with HM Customs and Excise and the RUC in seizing illicit supplies and arranging for the subsequent prosecution of offenders. It should be noted that any animal presented for slaughter with traceable and unjustified levels of clenbuterol will be condemned and destroyed.

DEFENCE

Royal Naval Supplies Depot

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he proposes to expand the royal naval supplies depot at Eaglescliffe, Stockton.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We have no plans at present to expand the royal naval stores depot at Eaglescliffe.

Tornados (Loss)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Tornados were lost during the Gulf war due to (a) enemy ground fire and (b) crashing into the ground from flying so low.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Seven Tornado GR1s were lost during the Gulf conflict. One of these crashed shortly after take-off due to a mechanical problem. The circumstances in which the other six were lost are still under investigation.

Arms Sales

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in what ways armed forces personnel are used to help arms manufacturers sell their goods abroad or at arms fairs; what is the cost to the Exchequer; whether manufacturers or sellers make any contribution towards these costs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Armed forces personnel provide assistance to the United Kingdom defence industry in a wide variety of ways, the costs of which, in general, fall either to the relevant companies or to the purchasing nations.

Kurdish Refugees

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's latest estimate of the number of Kurdish refugees killed by falling relief supplies; and what steps have been taken to improve the accuracy of supply drops.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I am not aware of any deaths caused by Royal Air Force relief operations. RAF aircrew take the greatest care to avoid accidents, and operating procedures are kept under constant review.

Iraq (Use of Weapons)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what ground-based anti-aircraft weapons systems were used by the Iraqis against RAF Tornados during the Gulf war; and if he will list them.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Before the conflict, Iraq was believed to have possessed the following air-defence systems:

surface to air missiles: SA-2, SA-3, SA-6, SA-7, SA-8, SA-9, SA-13, SA-14, ROLAND; air defence guns: 22mm ZSU-23-4, 37mm M-1939, 57mm (including ZSU-57-2), 85mm, 100mm, 130mm.

All aspects of the Gulf conflict are currently under investigation; it is not possible to say which systems were used against RAF Tornados.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's assessment as to (a) the capability of the JP233 bomb to immobilise Iraqi airfields permanently during the Gulf War and (b) how effectively the Iraqis were able to repair airfields attacked by JP233 bombs.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: RAF Tornado GR1s equipped with the JP233 low-level attack weapon system were used to disrupt and harass Iraqi air operations rather than to close Iraqi airfields. Detailed analysis of equipment and munition effectiveness during the Gulf conflict is still being undertaken.

Gulf War

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence at what time of the day was the friendly fire incident in late February in the Gulf in which five British service men lost their lives.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The incident in which US A-10 aircraft inadvertently attacked two Warrior armoured infantry vehicles, killing nine British servicemen occurred shortly after 1500 local time (1200 GMT) on 26 February 1991.

Chemical Agents (Defence Manual)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been (a) the production cost and (b) the distribution, of his Department's publication "Medical Manual of Defence Against Chemical Agents".

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The initial order in 1987 for 3,432 copies of the "Medical Manual of Defence Against Chemical Agents", which was printed by HMSO, incurred a production cost in the order of £8,400 at 1991 prices. The initial distribution was 2,256 Army, 180 RAF and 220 Royal Navy, with 776 kept in the maintenance stock. About 1,000 further copies were ordered from HMSO at the beginning of Operation Granby, and these were issued as required to the services.

Missing Documents

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on missing documents connected with the barracks at Aldershot, which were stolen from inside a vehicle stolen from a street in Chatham, Kent on 3 December 1990; what were the documents' security classification; and whether either (a) the documents or (b) the vehicle have yet been recovered.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A car belonging to a drainage contractor was stolen from outside his home in Chatham, Kent in early December 1990. It contained some unclassified maps and plans which the contractor needed to carry out his contract. As at 19 April neither the documents nor the car had been recovered.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

2. In the time available it has not been possible to provide a breakdown of the 1989-90 television and radio advertising figure.
3. Figures for 1990-91 are estimates.

I will write to the hon. Member once the 1991-92 figures are available.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I regret that the information cannot be provided in the form requested without disproportionate effort. I refer the hon. Member to the details given in the long-term projects tables, published as part of the supply estimates, class I, for the Ministry of Defence for the years in question.

Tanks

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the suitability of American manufactured tanks as a replacement for Chieftain tanks.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department is making a full assessment of the suitability of the US M1A2 Abrams tank as equipment for our future main battle tank fleet.

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to deploy British armed forces to protect the population of southern Iraq.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom has contributed a 20-strong contingent to the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait observation mission, which will operate in the demilitarised zone along the Iraq-Kuwait border. There are no other plans to deploy British forces into southern Iraq.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Uncorroborated Confessions

16. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to bring forward proposals to prevent convictions based on uncorroborated confessions in police custody; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The use of uncorroborated confession evidence is within the remit of the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice, as I announced to the House on 14 March. We shall consider what changes may be needed in the light of the commission's findings.

Right of Silence

17. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to amend the rules relating to the right of silence of suspects interviewed in police stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The right of silence will be among the matters to be considered by the Royal Commission and we should await its findings.

Community Service Orders

18. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress with community service orders.

Mrs. Rumbold: National standards on the supervision of community service orders were introduced two years ago, on 1 April 1989, and were designed to achieve tighter and more consistent management of this work by probation services. My Department will very shortly publish an analysis of the first year's operation of the standards.

Crime Prevention

19. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new measures he will propose to enhance the effectiveness of crime prevention; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government are constantly seeking to enhance the effectiveness of crime prevention in the interests of community safety. The report of an independent working group appointed by the Home Secretary to study the partnership approach to crime prevention is due in early summer. In the light of the group's findings the Government will consider whether further measures are necessary to ensure the effective organisation of crime prevention and to assess the impact of particular initiatives. In addition the Government will be evaluating the success of the national Crime Prevention Week which ended on 20 April.

Sunday Trading

20. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on the Sunday trading legislation; and if he will make a statement.

22. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has recently received about Sunday trading.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member and my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay).

Domestic Violence Units

21. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will report on progress in establishing domestic violence units.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: At least five forces have established dedicated units. A number of others are currently considering them as part of their response to the Home Office circular on domestic violence issued to the police last summer.

Detective Superintendent Alan Watson

23. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to whether Detective Superintendent Alan Watson is still on duty.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No, it would not be appropriate for my right hon. Friend to do so.

Crime

24. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new proposals he has to reduce the levels of crime.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We shall continue to develop and pursue vigorously our policies to combat crime and protect the public. These include additional people and money for the police and a growing programme of crime prevention measures. The provisions of the Criminal Justice Bill will enhance the courts' powers to deal effectively with offenders. Effective crime prevention is not just a responsibility of the Government, the police and the courts; it needs the support of the entire community.

Lollipop People

25. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what vacancies exist for lollipop people (a) in Ealing and (b) in the remaining London boroughs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Deputy Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that in Ealing, taken as the Metropolitan police divisions of Ealing and Southall, there are 20 vacancies for school crossing patrols. In the Metropolitan police district as a whole, vacancies exist for 245 school crossing patrols.

Prisons (Arts Courses)

26. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any courses in the arts are offered to prisoners.

Mrs. Rumbold: Yes. Visual arts and crafts, literature, music, film and video and drama and dance activities are all carried out in prisons. The Home Office has also funded with the Arts Council of Great Britain a recent research project into arts activities in prison. I shall be placing in the Library copies of this report and an accompanying directory of arts activities in prisons.

Miscarriages of Justice

27. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will update his response to the sixth report of the Home Affairs Committee of Session 1981-82, on miscarriages of justice.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier to the hon. Members for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) and for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott).

Drug Misuse

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce regular screening of prisoners for drug misuse.

Mrs. Rumbold: As my hon. Friend knows, all new receptions are seen and interviewed by health care staff and asked whether they have ever taken drugs. Indications of the use of drugs by injection are looked for at that time. Steps have been taken to try to reduce the supply of illicit drugs into establishments and the need for further measures is kept under review.

Deportation

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many nationals of middle east countries issued with notices of intention to deport on national security grounds (a) in November or December 1990 and (b) in January 1991 (i) were removed following the signing of a deportation order (ii) had deportation orders made against them and (iii) left the United Kingdom voluntarily.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The answer is as follows:

	Number
(a) (i)	None
(ii)	2
(iii)	[1]3
(b) (i)	None
(ii)	5
(iii)	56

[1] Including the two who left under their own arrangements after service of the deportation order.

Police Costs

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the annual cost of (a) police operations and (b) court time in England and Wales incurred while policing, investigating and prosecuting alleged offences by gay men under the Sexual Offences Act 1967.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information about the number and annual costs of such police operations and related court time is not kept centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Information about the number and location of new buildings or extensions commissioned by my Department in each of the last five years is not held centrally in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

However, details of capital projects of the values specified are included in the summaries of capital project expenditure in the supply estimates: Class IX, vote 2—table 1 (Prisons) and vote 3—table 1 (Administration, Immigration and Police Support Services).

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Figures for expenditure on newspaper and television advertising from 1979-80 to 1983-84 were given in an answer to a question from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 25 May 1984 at column 587 and those for 1984-85 were given in answer to another question from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West on 19 December 1985 at column 275.

Figures for radio advertising and other promotional literature for the years from 1979-80 to 1984-85 were given in answer to questions from the hon. Member on 19 November 1986 at columns 202-04. The hon. Member was also given in those replies figures for expenditure on newspaper, television and radio advertising and other promotional literature for 1985-86.

Figures for the years 1986-87 to 1990-91 (provisional) for total advertising expenditure—all media—and production and distribution of other promotional material were given in answer to a question from the hon. Member on 12 March 1990 at columns 23-24.

Apart from the final year, 1990-91, it would not be possible to provide more detailed information for those years except at disproportionate cost.

Expenditure figures for the years 1990-91 and 1991-92 are as follows:

	1990-91[1] £000's	1991-92[2] £000's
Television advertising	2,024	3,500
Radio advertising	[illegible]	300
Newspaper advertising	3,595	1,800

[1] Provisional.
[2] Estimate.

Household Insurance

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many local authorities have taken advantage of the block insurance scheme to enable residents in high crime areas to obtain insurance; what steps his Department is taking to encourage more local authorities to establish block insurance schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I understand that more than 100 local authorities take advantage of block insurance schemes to offer their tenants insurance cover, although the schemes are not necessarily related to the prevalance of crime in the area.

The standing conference on crime prevention working group on the costs of crime, which reported in December 1988, touched on the value of block insurance and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State subsequently brought the report to the attention of the Association of British Insurers. My officials have also been in touch with the Housing Corporation and the Insurance Service for Housing Associations. It is for local authorities to decide whether to establish schemes for their tenants.

Working Visas

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many citizens of (a) New Zealand, (b) Australia and (c) Canada were admitted to the United Kingdom on two-year working visas in each year from 1979 to 1990; and how many in each year were extended to three years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 8 April 1991]: Reliable figures of working holidaymaker admissions are available only from 1 May 1990. The numbers admitted between 1 May and 31 December 1990 are given in the following table. Under the immigration rules, the maximum stay permitted for working holidaymakers is two years.

Admissions as working holidaymakers for selected nationalities 1 May—31 December 1990

No. of persons

Nationality	Total admitted	of which: granted leave to enter for two years
New Zealand	6,440	4,930

Canada	1,800	1,130

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Accommodation

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Lord President of the Council why and when The Times received exceptional space in the Press Gallery of the House.

Mr. MacGregor: The authorities of the House have not been able to find out precisely when a room was allocated to The Times, but records going back as far as 1894 refer to this.

The hon. Member will be aware that The Times newspaper has a very long traditional connection with the reporting of the House and this may well have led to the allocation by our predecessors of a special room for use by its reporters.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make facilities available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Chris Patten: If the hon. Member sends me details of the appeal, I shall ensure that they are circulated within my office.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make facilities available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Haemophiliacs

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many haemophiliacs there are in each of the area health authorities in Wales;

(2) how many haemophiliacs in each of the area health authorities in Wales will receive the most pure form of factor 8; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Information on the number of haemophiliacs in each of the district health authorities in Wales is not held centrally. Central funds have been provided for the purchase of high purity factor VIII to treat patients under the care of the haemophilia reference centre at the university hospital of Wales. Its prescribing is a matter for the clinicians concerned and I am unable to provide information on the number of patients treated.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: A breakdown of annual expenditure by the Welsh Office on advertising and other publicity from 1979-80 to 1990-91 is set out in the following table.

Welsh Office publicity spend

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

All over £5 million

Locations	Numbers

1988-89
Prince Charles Hospital, Phase 2, Merthyr Tydfil	2

Hospital buildings are vested in the Secretary of State, but operational responsibility for them lies with the district health authority.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent initiatives have been taken by his Department to raise the level of public, industry and commercial awareness of energy efficiency and conservation in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The Energy Efficiency Office (Wales) has a continuing programme of visits and events for the promotion of the efficient use of energy for the benefit of industry, commerce, the public sector and domestic consumers.

This is in line with the strategic framework published by my predecessor, the right hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker), in May 1989, copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Speed Signs (M4)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales at what time the 30 mph and 60 mph speed limits were switched on on the illuminated maximum speed indicators on the westbound carriageway of the M4 motorway between junction 48 and the Pont Abraham services on the evening of Friday 19 April; at what time they were switched off; and what was the nature of the problem which necessitated the activation of the speed limits.

Sir Wyn Roberts: South Wales police are responsible for the operation of the matrix signalling system in the area involved.

Their records show that the system was activated once on Friday 19 April at 21.02 hours due to a vehicle (car) fire on the hard shoulder of the westbound carriageway. The fire service extinguished the fire, and the police switched off the matrix system at 21.33 hours.

It is police policy in such situations to activate 60 mph signs in advance of the incident and 30 mph signs closer to the scene.

Chernobyl

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the area in acres and hectares, the number of sheep, and the number of farms currently under restriction, including the county or counties involved, as a result of the radioactive contamination following the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. David Hunt: In Wales restrictions affect approximately 207,500 acres (approximately 84,000 hectares); 292,000 sheep (maximum post-lambing figure); and 410 holdings. The restrictions involve parts of the counties of Clwyd, Powys and Gwynedd.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total amount of grants from the Exchequer that have been paid to farmers in Wales to deal with the consequences of the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. David Hunt: As at 29 March 1991, compensation payments totalling £5,130,404 had been authorised for sheep producers in Wales affected by the Chernobyl incident.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) Television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Miss Widdecombe: For information from 1979-80 to 1989-90, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 12 March 1990 at cols 71-72.

The total estimated outturn for publicity in 1990-91 is £12·843 million. Of this, £5·025 million has been committed for the purpose of advertising.

The estimate for the 1991-92 national social security advertising and publicity budget is £12·992 million. Detailed decisions on media have not yet been made.

The estimate for the 1991-92 publicity budgets for the Benefits Agency is £8·724 million and £1·254 million for the Contributions Agency. Detailed decisions on media have not yet been made.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) has contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Jack: The Property Services Agency of the Department of the Environment has managed and executed new buildings and extensions on behalf of this Department in the period in question.

This Department commissioned buildings at the following locations within the following project values.

1986-87[1]	Nil	Nil

1989-90	Nil	Belfast, London North Fylde, Leeds, Preston, Newton Abbott
1990-91	North Fylde

[1]Before 1 April 1988 this Department had no responsibility for funding major new buildings on the Government's civil estate. This was the responsibility of the Property Services Agency.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what rules govern eligibility for unemployment benefit for those with part-time employment; and what form of recourse is available to claimants who have been refused unemployment benefit due to part-time employment.

Mr. Jack: A person working part-time must satisfy the contribution conditions for receipt of unemployment benefit and be available for work on the days for which he claims. He must also actively seek work and show that any restrictions he places on his availability do not prevent him from having reasonable prospects of employment. Benefit is not payable for any day on which he earns over £2, or for any week in which he has done his full normal week's work or earned at least £52.

A person refused unemployment benefit may appeal to the local social security appeal tribunal. He may also be entitled to family credit or income support.

Social Fund

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) of 11 March, Official Report, column 415 on the percentage of income support claimants repaying social fund loans, if he will give the figures for the East Midlands region, by local authority.

Mr. Scott: The administration of income support and the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and copies will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

Family Credit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many family credit awards were current; and what was the caseload including backdated awards at the end of each month since April 1989, for employees and self-employed people, respectively.

Mr. Jack: [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1991, cols. 417-18]: I regret that the figures given for the caseload for the months of August to December 1989 were incorrect. The correct information is as follows:

Local Government Finance

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many poll tax payers will lose their rebate entitlement as a result of the proposed reduction in the poll tax (a) nationally and (b) in Gateshead.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 28 March 1991]: It is estimated that, as a result of the general reduction of community charges by £140, the number of people qualifying for community charge benefit will be about 1·4 million less than if the previous higher charges had remained in place. This estimate takes account of the abolition, from 1 April 1991, of the minimum benefit rule for community charge benefit.

Information about Gateshead is not available

SCOTLAND

Highlands and Islands Enterprise

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of launching Highlands and Islands Enterprise and its associated local enterprise companies.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This is an operational matter for Highlands and Islands Enterprise. I have asked the chairman to write direct to the hon. Member.

Legal System

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when Glasgow sheriff court opens and closes each day.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Glasgow sheriff court opens to the public at 9.15 am on weekdays and closes when all courtroom business has been completed or when the offices close at 3.45 pm, whichever is the later. Court business can also be conducted outwith these times where necessary.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average hours use per day on judicial business of Glasgow sheriff court.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In the quarter ending 31 December 1990, the average court sitting day, excluding lunch breaks, was 3·8 hours. In addition, sheriffs undertook judicial business in chambers.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many sheriffs, including sheriff principals there are in each sheriffdom; and how many there were five years ago.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The complement for each sheriffdom is set out in the table:

	1991	1986
Glasgow and Strathkelvin	24	24
Grampian, Highland and Islands	13	13
Lothian and Borders	16	15
North Strathclyde	15	13
South Strathclyde, Dumfries and Galloway	16	13

Health Service Contracts

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for the Argyll and Clyde health board (a) the services which are subject to compulsory competitive tendering, (b) the contracts which have been awarded to the private sector and (c) the contracts which have been awarded in-house; and what plans he has to extend compulsory competitive tendering in the health service.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is as follows:

a) The services of domestic catering, portering, transport and painting have been subjected to competitive tendering.

b) Two contracts for portering and one for painter work have been awarded to outside contractors.

c) 19 contracts have been awarded in-house.

This has released an extra £2·2 million for the board to spend on patient care.

Health boards have been encouraged to keep under review the range of services which may be susceptible to competitive tendering.

Homes for the Elderly

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further resources he has allocated to local authorities in Scotland to help them meet targets for the provision of homes for the elderly in terms of both quantity and quality.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There are no such targets set centrally. The allocation of grant-aided expenditure for social work for 1991-92 provides for an increase of 14 per cent. on that for 1990-91. It is for individual authorities to decide on the allocation of expenditure to particular services in accordance with their own perception of needs and priorities.

Schools

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each year since 1980 the number of special classes or units in primary schools in each local authority region, expressing this as a proportion of all (a) primary schools in the region and (b) secondary schools in each region; and if he will express this as a proportion of all secondary schools in the region.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is readily available only from 1987.

The numbers and proportions of education authority primary and secondary schools with an attached special department, including classes or units, at September in each year are shown in the table:

Courts (Closed Circuit Television)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has concerning the provision of closed circuit television links in court proceedings involving child witnesses in cases dealing with physical and or sexual abuse subsequent to the introduction of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I indicated last year in our debates on what are now sections 56 to 59 of the 1990 Act that we would be consulting the judiciary about the arrangements for implementation of these provisions. Equipment demonstrations have been mounted and consultations have taken place. An announcement will be made when we have completed our examination of the results.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria he will use to judge whether to approve or otherwise any application for setting up an NHS trust.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The criteria for NHS trust applications are published in "NHS Trusts: A Working Guide".

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland under what authority the chief executive of the national health service in Scotland has appointed Douglas Brown and Donald MacNeill as chairman designate and chief executive designate, respectively, of the Ayrshire national health service trust; on whose authority Donald MacNeill is organising the national health service trust application from property belonging to the Ayrshire and Arran health board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No appointments have been made by the chief executive of the national health service in Scotland: that of chairman-designate was announced by the Secretary of State. Procedures for applications are laid down in chapter 5 of "NHS Trusts: A Working Guide", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements he has made to ensure that members or officers of health boards charged with the responsibility of carrying out the consultation on NHS trusts are not themselves involved in any way in the trust application.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In all cases where trust proposals are being pursued, a team drawn from the unit concerned has been established under the control of a project manager.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information is included in the application for national health service trust status for the new Ayr hospital about the prospective directors of the trust.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The application describes the proposed management framework. This will be examined as part of the assessment of the trust proposal.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guarantees he has given to those appointed as officers designate of NHS trusts that they will be appointed to the equivalent substantive positions on the trusts, if eventually approved.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None. The appointment of executive members of a trust is a matter for the chairman and non-executive members.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the details of the standard contract between health boards in Scotland and proposed national health service trusts.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 22 April 1991]: There is no standard contract. NHS contracts between health boards and NHS trusts will be a matter for the parties concerned having regard to any general guidance which may be issued from time to time by the Scottish Office Home and Health Department.

Chernobyl

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the area in acres and hectares, the number of sheep, and the number of farms currently under restriction, including the county or counties involved, as a result of the radioactive contamination following the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Following the removal from 14 January 1991 of restrictions on a number of farms in Scotland, 148,647 acres (60,181 hectares), 116,000 sheep, post-lambing figure, and 63 farms in parts of Central region, Stirling district; Dumfries and Galloway region, Stewartry, Wigtown and Nithsdale districts; Strathclyde region, Cumnock and Doon Valley, Kyle and Carrick, Cunninghame, Kilmarnock and Loudoun, East Kilbride and Eastwood districts are currently subject to restriction under the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Radioactivity in Sheep) Order 1991.

Inverclyde Initiative

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the central Government financial assistance to the Inverclyde initiative, since its creation detailing precise allocations to specific activities.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 26 March 1991]: Central Government financial assistance to the Inverclyde Initiative for the years in question was as follows:

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list for each year from 1986 onwards the number of reported cases of cancer-related diseases in (a) Scotland, (b) Forth Valley district health board area, (c) Falkirk district, (d) the postal district FK4, (e) the postal district FK5 and (f) the postal district FK6.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 19 April 1991]: The number of cancer-related[1] diseases from 1986 onwards for (a) Scotland, (b) Forth Valley health board area, (c) Falkirk local government district, (d) the postal district FK4, (e) the postal district FK5 and (f) the postal district FK6 are shown in the table:

Aberdeen Royal Infirmary

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish or place in the Library the minutes of discussion and decision of Grampian health board of 7 March with regard to the item dealing with NHS trust status of Aberdeen royal infirmary, Foresterhill site.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 22 April 1991]: Board minutes are a matter for the board concerned, in this particular case the discussion referred to took place in closed session, but I understand that Grampian health board has made clear to the hon. Member its willingness to make the minutes available.

Forestry Commission

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the names of each individual on each regional advisory committee of the Forestry Commission and indicate whether they represent forestry, trade union or environmental interests.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 22 April 1991]: The Forestry Act 1967 stipulates that not fewer than four members of each regional advisory committee will be appointed by the Forestry Commissioners after consultation with organisations appearing to them to represent the interests of owners of woodlands and timber merchants respectively and organisations concerned with the study and promotion of forestry. In 1974, Forestry Ministers instructed the commissioners to appoint to each RAC representatives of agricultural, planning and environmental interests; it was also decided that the remaining place should continue to be allocated to a trade union representative.

The names of the members of each RAC, and the backgrounds from which they have been drawn, are given in the table. RAC chairmen are, as far as possible, appointed from independent backgrounds.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the biographical details of the Forestry Commissioners indicating whether they have experience in (a) forestry, (b) environment and conservation, (c) employment and (d) other.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Whales

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to press for a permanent ban on any killing of whales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I have taken a strong stand, both as Minister of State and as Minister, on the importance of conserving whale stocks and I have repeatedly stated my determination that no whale stock should again be over-exploited by man. Unless and until certain conditions are met I would not even contemplate agreeing to the lifting of the moratorium imposed by the International Whaling Commission on commercial whaling.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he intends to make any representations to the Japanese authorities about their continued slaughter of whales.

Mr. Curry: The Japanese Government are well aware of our views on scientific whaling. Last year the United Kingdom co-sponsored a resolution agreed by the International Whaling Commission calling on Japan to reconsider her intention of conducting scientific research whaling in the Antarctic ocean. Japan agreed to modify her programme in the light of comments by the IWC's scientific committee. We shall raise the issue again at the forthcoming meeting of the IWC.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food under what circumstances he would support a limited resumption of commercial whaling.

Mr. Curry: We are not prepared even to contemplate agreeing to the lifting of the moratorium placed by the International Whaling Commission on commercial whaling unless and until it is clear that whale stocks are at healthy levels, a satisfactory management procedure is in place and the methods of killing whales are as humane as possible. These conditions have not yet been met.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will pursue a common and permanent ban on the killing of whales for commercial, research or other purposes within the EC's common fisheries policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The European Community does not have competence for whaling matters and could not therefore take action within the common fisheries policy. There are no moves, however, by any member state to begin whaling in Community waters and trade in cetacean products is prohibited.

The United Kingdom has been and will remain in the forefront in the International Whaling Commission in working to ensure that the objective of conserving whales is fully observed.

Scottish Seed Potatoes

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to whom his Department communicates the relevant information where his plant health department confirms that a batch of Scottish seed potatoes has high levels of virus infection.

Mr. Curry: If virus levels in excess of those prescribed in the Seed Potatoes Regulations 1984 are found in Scottish seed potatoes dispatched to England and Wales, this is reported immediately to the Scottish Office.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what regulations govern the disposal or destruction of a consignment of Scottish seed potatoes which are confirmed to have high levels of infection or virus.

Mr. Curry: Regulation 18 of the Seed Potatoes Regulations 1984 provides authorised officers with powers to serve notices requiring action to be taken in respect of seed potatoes which, on an official examination, do not meet various requirements in the regulations. The course to be taken will depend on the circumstances of the case. Notices are unlikely to be served if all the tubers have been removed from their sealed containers, thereby preventing their resale as seed, and if the virus concerned is not one which is subject to statutory action under the Plant Health (Great Britain) Order 1987.

Agricultural Spending

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many letters he has received on the subject of the decision by the United Kingdom on 8 April to oppose the measures presented by the Commission to increase the legal limits of agricultural spending; and what is the nature of these representations;

(2) if he will make a statement on the measures proposed on 8 April by the European Commission on the limits of agricultural spending; and what steps the Council now proposes to take on these proposals.

Mr. Curry: The Commission's 1991-92 price proposals, published on 13 March, are designed to contain agricultural expenditure within the legally binding limit —the guideline. At the ECOFIN Council on 8 April the United Kingdom confirmed its support for a settlement compatible with the guideline.

Farm Subsidies

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what was the average subsidy paid in the last financial year, on a per acre basis to farms smaller than 163 acres;

(2) what was the average subsidy paid in the last financial year, on a per acre basis, to farms larger than 163 acres;

(3) what assessment his Department has made of the extent to which farm size is an accurate basis for the allocation of financial subsidies;

(4) what was the average subsidy paid on a per acre basis to farms of 33 acres or less in the last financial year.

Mr. Curry: Support for farmers under the CAP is provided primarily through market prices; in some sectors direct subsidies to farmers also play a role. The level of support received by individual farmers will depend on factors such as the combination of enterprises on a particular holding and the level of output, and any estimate of average levels of support per acre would be of little relevance. For these reasons farm size on its own would not provide a satisfactory basis for determining levels of support.

Common Agricultural Policy

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what assessment his Department has made of the effects that the proposed alterations to the CAP would have on the British farming industry;

(2) what is his estimate of the average subsidy which will be paid on a per acre basis to farms of (a) 33 acres or less, (b) less than 163 acres and (c) more than 163 acres over the current financial year and in that beginning in April 1992 if the current proposals for the reform of the CAP go ahead unchanged.

Mr. Curry: The European Commission has yet to produce detailed proposals for the reform of the CAP. If the Commission was to pursue the principles for reform set out in its February discussion paper, United Kingdom producers would be severely disadvantaged.

Green Premiums

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the extent to which the proposed levels of green premiums payable to farmers will be sufficient to compensate farmers for the loss of income brought about by (a) the use of less intensive farming techniques and (b) the reduction in subsidies from the CAP.

Mr. Curry: There are no proposals yet from the European Commission for green premiums.

Livestock Rendering

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many companies in the livestock rendering industry have gone out of business in the last 12 months.

Mr. Maclean: This information is not available centrally. However, since 1 April 1990 10 renderers in Great Britain have asked to have their names removed from the register of protein processors under the Processed Animal Protein Order 1989.

Green Currency

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to seek the abolition of the green currency system.

Mr. Curry: It is Government policy to seek the removal of the monetary gaps created by the green currency system by the end of 1992 at the latest.

Blue Ear Disease

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps are being taken by his Department to ensure that blue ear disease in pigs is kept out of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: Under European Community rules, member states are not permitted to send breeding or production pigs to other member states from holdings or, where appropriate, municipalities where the new blue ear pig disease exists.

The disease has been confirmed in Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands and Spain. Because we have no foot and mouth disease quarantine premises approved for the handling of pigs, we do not, in any case, import live pigs from these countries. There is no evidence that pigmeat contributes to the transmission of this disease, but we shall continue to keep a close watch on developments and we shall press for additional controls if these appear justified on the basis of scientific evidence.

Farm Diversification

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to seek through the policies of the EC to encourage diversification within the rural economy.

Mr. Curry: This has been our policy for several years and we have already secured the adoption of Council regulation 3808/89, which extends the scope of the Community provisions for capital grants for farmers to include grants for diversification.

Production Methods

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to seek to amend the common agricultural policy to improve and widen incentives to production methods which enhance environmental protection and countryside management.

Mr. Curry: Our aim is to secure greater integration of environmental and agricultural policies so as to encourage farming methods which protect the environment and enhance the natural beauty of the countryside.

Farms (Environmental Benefits)

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to seek amendment to the common agricultural policy to make environmental benefits available to farmers and landowners irrespective of the size of their property.

Mr. Curry: Our policy is to ensure that schemes offering incentives to farmers and landowners to adopt environmentally friendly farming systems continue to apply irrespective of farm size.

Set-aside Scheme

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to support the European Commission's proposal for a more effective and attractive set-aside scheme.

Mr. Curry: We favour making the set-aside scheme more effective and attractive. In particular we need to ensure more even uptake throughout the Community and to make set-aside more environmentally friendly. The Commission's proposal for a one-year set-aside scheme linked to refund of cereals co-responsibility levy does not meet these objectives; therefore we do not support it.

Farming Techniques

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies his Department has made or intends to make of incentives to encourage farmers to move towards less-intensive farming techniques.

Mr. Curry: Socio-economic and environmental evaluation studies are being carried out in respect of the environmentally sensitive areas, nitrate sensitive areas and pilot beef and sheep extensification schemes.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extentions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Curry: The Ministry took on responsibility for vote accounting and project sponsorship for major new building projects three years ago. Before this the Department of the Environment, Property Services Agency held this responsibility and I have details therefore only of commissions placed after the date of the change.

New buildings commissioned by this Department over these last three financial years in the categories requested are:

(i) value between £3 million and £5 million 1989-90. One at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk.

(ii) value over £5 million 1988-89. One near Sand Hutton, Yorkshire. One at Weymouth, Dorset.

There were no extensions.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Curry: Expenditure by the Department in the financial year 1982-83 and each subsequent year was as follows:

	(a) TV	(b) Radio	(c) Press advertising £	(d) Other publicity material £
1982-83	nil	nil	3,000	n/a
1983-84	nil	nil	27,000	n/a
1984-85	nil	nill	26,000	575,000
1985-86	nil	nil	29,000	656,000
1986-87	nil	nil	54,000	825,000
1987-88	nil	nil	12,000	693,000
1988-89	nil	nil	380,000	1,004,000
1989-90	nil	nil	116,000	2,373,000
1990-91	nil	nil	53,000	2,379,000

Figures for publicity advertising prior to 1982-83 are not available as the information for those years includes recruitment and other types of advertising. Information is not readily available to distinguish between expenditure on advertising in newspapers and that in the press generally. Separate figures for expenditure on other publicity material prior to 1984-85 are available only at disproportionate cost.

The overall publicity budget for 1991-92 is estimated to be £4·4 million.

Fish Imports

Mr. Battle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the level of imports of Icelandic fish, both as a total figure and as a percentage of all imports of fish.

Mr. Curry: In 1990, the latest year for which we have complete figures, United Kingdom imports of fresh, chilled and frozen fish from Iceland totalled 109,198 tonnes. This is 36 per cent. of the total United Kingdom imports for 1990, or 302,313 tonnes.

Chernobyl

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about his reasons for refusing to grant permission for the publication in the New Scientist of a scientific paper by scientists from his Ministry about the behaviour of radioactive caesium in the soil following the contamination of British soil arising from the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. Gummer: My Department took the initiative for and prepared this article. A text for publication was submitted to the New Scientist on 4 April, and I hope that it will publish it in a future edition. The hon. Member's information is therefore not correct.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the area in acres and hectares, the number of sheep, and the number of farms currently under restriction, including the county or counties involved, as a result of the radioactive contamination following the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. Gummer: Following the release of some areas from restriction this January, the information for England is as follows:

county: Cumbria area: approximately 104,000 acres (42,000 hectares) holdings: 144
sheep: 130,000 (estimated post-lambing figure).

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all actions taken by his Department since the Chernobyl accident to mitigate the effects upon United Kingdom farmers of the radioactive fallout from the Soviet accident.

Mr. Maclean: Full details of the Department's actions were submitted to the Agriculture Select Committee in May 1988. The development of live-monitoring techniques and the introduction of "mark and release" arrangements were designed to minimise disruption of normal husbandry practices of those farmers whose sheep have been caught by post-Chernobyl movement and slaughter restrictions and the Government have so far paid over £8 million in compensation to the farmers concerned. In addition, we have funded an extensive scientific research programme aimed at obtaining a better understanding of the behaviour of radiocaesium in the affected upland ecologies and at identifying any options for remedial treatment of either the land or the sheep which graze it. However, our first priority has been to ensure that consumers remain fully protected at all times and, by successfully maintaining public confidence in the quality and safety of British produce, the Government have helped to sustain healthy markets for British farmers both at home and overseas.

Clenbuterol

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any evidence of the use of clenbuterol in cattle; what precautions have been taken to detect the importation of clenbuterol from Community countries; what new controls have been introduced this year to control the importation from the Republic of Ireland of beef strengthened by clenbuterol; and if he will make a statement on the existence and use of clenbuterol in the beef industry.

Mr. Maclean: Clenbuterol is the active ingredient in three veterinary medicinal products licensed under the Medicines Act for use, only on prescription, to treat respiratory disease in calves and horses and as an aid to cattle at the time of calving. At present, there is no evidence of any existence or use of illegal clenbuterol in the beef industry in Great Britain.

Last year, around 300 liver samples were taken from slaughterhouses in Great Britain and tested for clenbuterol. No positives were detected. Surveillance in 1991 is being stepped up, both in terms of the number of animals tested, and the age range of cattle covered. Within the Ministry's imported meat monitoring programme, which includes checks on meat from EC countries such as the Republic of Ireland, 114 liver samples have been tested and no positives found.

Carcases (St. Tudwals)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the results of his Department's investigations into the carcases of red deer and sheep on the island of St. Tudwals, near Abersoch, Gwynedd.

Mr. David Hunt: I have been asked to reply.

Samples were submitted for examination to the veterinary investigation centre at Bangor by a private veterinary surgeon. This was an ordinary commercial transaction and as with all such work the results are confidential.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners in Police Cells

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on prisoners in police cells in Greater Manchester and surrounding areas; what is the number of convicted and remand prisoners held in cells and the number of places available in prisons, which are not available due to industrial action; and when it is expected police cells will be free of such prisoners.

Mrs. Rumbold: On 25 April there were 444 prisoners in police cells as a result of the loss of accommodation at Manchester prison following the disturbance last year. Prison Service management is giving priority to the resolution of this problem, but is constrained by the availability of accommodation and by the policy of the Prison Officers' Association not to accept into local prisons and remand centres inmates from outside the catchment areas of those establishments. Of the 444, 101 are adult remand prisoners, and this element of the population can be removed from police cells when further refurbished accommodation in Manchester becomes available this summer.

I have been especially concerned at the numbers of young men on remand held in police cells. There were 55 on 25 April. The principal difficulty in respect of such inmates is the limited capacity of Hindley remand centre. Prison Service management has been working to transfer some young men awaiting trial to Stoke Heath remand centre to create space for those on remand. The Stoke Heath branch of the Prison Officers' Association was initially unwilling to agree that the establishment should accept prisoners awaiting trial, but I am glad to be able to tell the hon. Member that management has reached agreement with the union branch and that trial prisoners should begin to be transferred from 7 May. This means that young men on remand should be cleared from police cells over the next few weeks.

Prison Service management is seeking to transfer convicted inmates in police cells to training prison accommodation. While most of the training prison estate is being operated at a very high level of occupancy, new accommodation is available at Full Sutton—192 places—and Acklington—152 places. This accommodation could be used to relieve other northern establishments so as to provide space within the prison system both for adult sentenced inmates, of whom there were 149 in police cells on 25 April, and for convicted persons awaiting sentence, of whom there were 98 in police cells. I very much regret that the local POA branches at these establishments have so far refused to allow this accommodation to be used. As a result, convicted prisoners are being held unnecessarily in police cells. If these places could be brought into use, and the spaces created at northern local prisons, the use of police cells could be substantially reduced immediately.

My right hon. Friend and I are most grateful to the Greater Manchester police and to other police forces for the way that they have coped with the burden placed on them by the Prison Service's recourse to police cells. Prison Service management remains committed to removing that burden in the shortest possible time.

Public Servants (Death)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what restrictions apply to the disclosure of the method of murder or suicide by police officers or other public servants before an inquest or court case.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Apart from the sub judice rule, there are no legal restrictions on the amount of information about a homicide or suicide which police officers or other public servants can disclose, but they will not want to publicise details which may be of potential use in an investigation and as evidence against a suspect. It is for the courts to decide on the actual cause of death.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the percentage of (a) police personnel and (b) police financial resources that are devoted in the Metropolitan area overall to (i) foot patrols, (ii) traffic regulation, (iii) parking regulation and (iv) diplomatic, royal and VIP protection.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand that the available information is as follows. Fourteen per cent. of available police man-days are devoted to foot patrols, including home beats and other street duties, 3·3 per cent. to protection duties and 3·5 per cent. to traffic and parking regulation combined.

Twenty-six per cent. of Metropolitan Police current expenditure is devoted to patrol, which includes officers engaged on foot patrols, home beats, vehicle patrols, and dog handlers and mounted branch officers engaged on local patrol, 6·6 per cent. to traffic and parking regulation combined, which includes the work of the traffic warden service, and 3·4 per cent. to protection duties.

Isle of Man (Human Rights)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what indications he has given to the authorities in the Isle of Man of the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the steps to be taken by the Isle of Man to honour its obligations under the European convention of human rights in relation to the liberties of lesbians and gay men.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have made clear to the Isle of Man authorities that, in order to enable the United Kingdom to conform with its obligations under the convention, the island's legislation on homosexuality should be amended; that it is desirable that the Isle of Man should itself amend the legislation; but that, if necessary, the United Kingdom will legislate on the island's behalf.

Prison Deaths

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all deaths that have occured in 1990 of persons detained in prison department establishments, stating, in each case, the age and sex of the inmates and cause of death, the inquest verdict, whether the inmate was sentenced or on remand, the establishment where the inmate was detained, and whether the death occurred there or in an outside hospital and for where the death occurred within the prison whether the inmate was segregated either on the hospital wing or in the punishment block.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information is given in the table. Deaths occurred within the establishment unless otherwise indicated. None of the inmates located in the prison hospital at the time of death was segregated under rule 43 of the prison rules.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The deputy commissioner tells me that the complement and the staff in post in the press and public relations office of the Metropolitan police on 1 April in each year are as shown in the table.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The table below shows the staff in post on 1 April in the Home Office public relations branch, which includes a press office and a publicity section, for each year from 1979 to 1991. The figures combine members of the information officer grades and administrative and support staff.

Merseyside Probation Committee

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Merseyside probation committee budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Merseyside probation committee has proposed a budget increase in 1991-92 of 12·8 per cent. I have received request for a determination of its proposed budget from the Metropolitan boroughs of Sefton and St. Helens. Clearly the probation committee and the boroughs need to know the final budget as soon as possible in order to manage expenditure properly this financial year. Full consideration must, however, be given to the objections raised by the boroughs and to the committee's detailed response. The determination will be announced as soon as possible.

Family Conciliation Services

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what funding his Department provides to national or local family conciliation services; what plans he has to increase such funding to take account of planned legislative changes in divorce and child support procedures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: We do not fund any national or local family conciliation services apart from in-court conciliation work done by probation services. We have no plans to fund any other such services.

Armley Prison

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the latest suicide of a prisoner in Armley gaol; what preventive measures were taken in screening prisoners; and how many recommendations to the chief inspector of prisons relating to Armley have been implemented.

Mrs. Rumbold: The circumstances relating to this very sad death will be fully and openly investigated at the coroner's inquest. It would not be right for me to comment until the jury has reached its verdict on the cause of death.

The hon. Member will be aware, from the statement which my right hon. Friend made on publication of the report by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons into Leeds prison last year, that the Government are fully committed to improving conditions in the prison. The task is a substantial one but much has already been achieved. Overcrowding has been considerably reduced and the treble occupancy of cells ended. Levels of out-of-cell activity for prisoners have improved. The length of family visits to prisoners has sharply increased; it is now common for unconvicted prisoners to enjoy regular visits of 45 minutes or longer. Meanwhile, a major redevelopment programme is under way, which will see the building of two new wings and a new hospital, kitchen and sports hall by 1992, and in due course the refurbishment of the whole establishment, including the provision of integral sanitation. The new establishment opening this year at Moorland, near Doncaster, will provide considerable relief for Leeds. In particular, it will offer more suitable accommodation for all the young unconvicted prisoners currently held at Leeds and Hull prisons.

Asylum

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Government have to increase resources for dealing with claims for asylum in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In view of the growth in the number of asylum claims which have been made in the course of the past two years, I intend to increase over the next 12 months the number of staff in the asylum and special cases division of the Home Office from 120 to over 500. This will allow for the quicker recognition of genuine refugees and the refusal of applications from those with no valid claim. Additional resources are also being made available for interviewing and for removing rejected applicants who fail to leave voluntarily. In addition, the Government plan substantially to increase their contribution to the refugee unit of the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service, which provides advice and counselling to asylum seekers.

ENVIRONMENT

Spray Irrigation

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to monitor the quantities of water used by spray irrigation of golf courses in England and Wales.

Mr. Baldry: Either the local water company or the National Rivers Authority is responsible for such monitoring, depending on the source of supply. The chairman of the NRA will write to my hon. Friend.

Toxic Waste (Wath upon Dearne)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether contact is maintained between his Department and the relevant local authorities and public agencies in regard to the problems prescribed by the large number of drums of toxic waste held in Wath upon Dearne.

Mr. Baldry: Waste at Wath recycling has been safely drummed and stored in accordance with the requirements of the local waste disposal authority and relevant Government inspectorates. The site is regularly inspected by the waste disposal authority. There are no immediate problems requiring further steps by any of those concerned.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any evidence that metal drums used for the containing or oil of chemical material are likely to be subject to such changes as allow leakage at the point of the top cover or at the lip; and if such leakage is likely to occur where toxic wastes are contained, as at Wath upon Dearne, near Rotherham, at a site know to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Baldry: I have no such evidence.

West Midlands Police Authority

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the West Midlands police authority regarding its standard spending assessment.

Mr. Key: Representations were received from the West Midlands police authority, during the period of consultation on the proposed revenue support grant settlement for 1991-92, about the adequacy of its provisional standard spending assessment in relation to its proposed budget from 1991-92. These representations were fully taken into account before final decisions were taken for 1991-92.

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the formula he uses for determining the standard spending assessment of the West Midlands police authority.

Mr. Key: The formula is set out in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England) as amended by the Revenue Support Grant Distribution (Amendment) Report which was debated and approved by the House of Commons on 29 January 1991. Copies of both reports are available in the Library.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recently released report prepared jointly by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development Nuclear Energy Agency and the International Atomic Energy Agency on radioactive waste disposal.

Mr. Baldry: The Government welcome the report recently published by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, OECD, entitled "Disposal of Radioactive Waste: Can Long-Term Safety be Evaluated?". It concludes that safety assessment methods are available today to evaluate adequately the potential long-term radiological impacts of a carefully designed radioactive waste disposal system on humans and the environment. I will place copies of the report in the Library shortly.

Chernobyl

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what emergency preparations are in hand in the event of the Soviet sarcophagus at the damaged Chernobyl reactor collapsing and releasing radioactive dust into the atmosphere.

Mr. Baldry: The national response plan for handling the consequences for the United Kingdom of overseas nuclear accidents sets out the arrangements which would be activated if we were notified of an accident involving a significant release of radioactivity to the environment, or if the RIMNET monitoring system detected radioactivity arriving in this country. These arrangements are set out in the booklet "The National Response Plan and Radioactive Incident Monitoring Network (RIMNET) —Phase I", published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what offers of technical assistance have been (a) sought from and (b) made by his Department to the Soviet atomic energy authorities in the clean-up and long-term management of radioactive waste arising from the Chernobyl accident in April 1986.

Mr. Baldry: I understand that the Soviet Union has not requested any assistance from the United Kingdom Government in respect of these matters. Nevertheless, the United Kingdom is prepared to give sympathetic consideration to any such requests.

Minerals Industry

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the results of the work undertaken by Groundwork on the minerals industry and the environment.

Mr. Yeo: The study contains six recommendations. The most important of these is that each company should establish a system of environmental management as an integral part of its organisation. This would include publishing a corporate environmental policy statement, regular monitoring of performance and a periodic environmental audit. The report also recommends training, production of design manuals and codes of practice, and promotion of the importance of the industry and its environmental achievements. The role of the trade associations in achieving these aims is emphasised.

We fully endorse the recommendations, particularly the emphasis on self-regulation. Minerals are an important national resource and it is essential that the country has a continual and adequate supply. But as we said in the Environment White Paper this has to be balanced against amenity and other environmental considerations. Although the industry has made major steps in raising standards there is scope for more to be done. We believe the Groundwork report has identified a number of positive and beneficial initiatives which are to be commended to the industry. It is our intention to discuss with industry how this can be done and I look forward to their continuing support and co-operation.

As an immediate follow-up to the study the Department is to fund an initial pilot study by Groundwork to encourage the improvement of the environmental performance of the minerals industry with the aim of formulating an industry wide initiative. The project forms part of the Department's geological and minerals planning research programme and is planned to start this summer.

A copy of the report has been placed in the Library.

Green Belt

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the chairman of the London Green Belt council concerning his predecessor's assurance that land covered by the London and Home Counties Green Belt Act 1938 is inalienable; and if he will make a statement setting out his present policy with regard to proposals by local authorities to dispose of properties acquired under the Act.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 23 April 1991]: The chairman of the London Green Belt council wrote on 18 November 1990 and 5 January and 6 February 1991, receiving replies from my officials. The Government remain committed to ensuring that land held under the 1938 Act continues to fulfil green belt objectives. In considering any applications for consent to disposal under section 5 of the 1938 Act, one of the factors which my right hon. Friend will take into account is whether retention of the land in public ownership is necessary or desirable as a means of securing those objectives. Right to buy considerations arise only in respect of dwellings occupied by secure tenants; the same considerations would not be relevant to proposals to dispose of open land.

TRANSPORT

A65

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve the western section of the A65 road between Kirkby Lonsdale and the M6.

Mr. Chope: There are two schemes in the road programme for this section of the A65. These are the Hornsbarrow diversion and the Moss Side to Lupton improvement.

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of road accidents, together with the numbers of injuries and deaths, on the western stretch of the A65 road between Kirkby Lonsdale and the M6 for each of the past five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Chope: The following table shows the details of personal injury road accidents on the section of the A65 from the west and of Kirkby Lonsdale to the M6 motorway.

Year	Personal injury road accidents	Casualties: Fatal	Serious	Slight	Total
1986	6	0	3	8	11
1987	6	0	3	3	6
1988	9	0	3	10	13
1989	13	0	3	16	19
1990	8	0	3	9	12
Totals	42	0	15	46	61

Exhaust Emissions

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the volume of carcinogenic substances emitted on a yearly basis by the average motor car; and if he will take steps to monitor the future pattern of such emissions.

Mr. Chope: Estimates of the emissions of benzene and polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAHs)—the substances in question—vary greatly. Recent work by the university of East Anglia for the Department of Transport suggests that about 11,000 tonnes of benzene and 40 tonnes of PAHs are emitted each year from road transport. The estimates are too general to allow the figures to be calculated for the average motor car, as a substantial portion of the emissions comes from trucks and buses.

The amount of benzene and PAHs emitted by new petrol-engined cars will be greatly reduced when catalysts become standard fitment at the end of 1992. The EC directive that will provide for this will also require the control of evaporative emissions from cars, restricting another way that benzene escapes to the atmosphere.

Diesel engines fitted to trucks and buses are the primary source of PAHs from road traffic, and the tight new standards for these engines agreed in the Community last month address this area.

Part of the Department of Transport's research effort is directed at producing better estimates of these emissions. The Department of Environment is also stepping up its monitoring of the atmospheric concentrations of hydrocarbons, including benzene.

Speed Limits

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about EC plans to standardise speed limits within the EC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: In 1989, the Commission proposed a directive harmonising goods vehicle and coach speed limits in the EC. This has yet to be considered by the Council of Ministers.

HGV Speed Limiters

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about EC plans for heavy goods vehicle speed limiter legislation.

Mr. Chope: The European Commission has proposed a technical standard for speed limiters, based on a standard agreed in the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe. Under the Commission proposal, member states could not refuse to register a vehicle on the grounds that it was fitted with a speed limiter conforming to the standard, but there has been no Commission proposal for mandatory fitment.

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to fit speed limiters to heavy goods vehicles on a retrospective basis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: We have consulted about a proposal to require speed limiters to be fitted to new heavy goods vehicles of more than 7·5 tonnes gross vehicle weight. We also invited views about fitting speed limiters to vehicles already on the road. These views are being considered and an announcement will be made shortly.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr.McLoughlin: The number of staff employed in the press and public relations office of the Department of Transport on 1 April 1989, 1990 and 1991 is as follows:

	Staff in post	Complement
1 April 1991	17	18
1 April 1990	17	18
1 April 1989	17	not known

Before 1989, these staff formed part of the common services of this Department and the Department of the Environment and separate figures are not readily available.

DEFENCE

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what facilities have been made available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: As yet we have received no formal request from the St. John Ambulance Brigade about this appeal. Should such a request be received, we will consider the extent of the support we might offer.

RAF Finningley

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 25 January, Official Report, column 358, to the hon. Member for Don Valley, from which countries the three personnel came.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Canada, Germany and the United States of America.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The number of service personnel and civilians employed on press and public relations work in the MOD in the years 1982-83 to 1990-91 is as follows:

Years	Numbers employed	Complement
1982-83	222·0	n/a
1983-84	290·0	n/a
1984-85	282·5	n/a
1985-86	249·5	n/a
1986-87	215·0	217
1987-88	206·0	217
1988-89	213·0	217
1989-90	212·0	221
1990-91	221·0	221

The estimate for 1991-92 is similar to 1990-91.

Figures for 1979-80, 1980-81 and 1981-82 are not available. The numbers given for 1983-84 onwards include all service personnel and civilians in complemented PR and PR support posts in London and commands and districts at home and overseas: the 1982-83 figure was not prepared on this comprehensive basis.

Chieftain Tanks (Replacement)

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the suitability of German manufactured tanks as a replacement for Chieftain tanks.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department is making a full assessment of the suitability of the German Leopard 2 (Improved) tank as equipment for our future main battle tank fleet.

MOD Civilian Guard

Mr. Mates: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is now able to make a statement about the formation of a new Ministry of Defence civilian guard service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has decided to establish a new Ministry of Defence civilian guard service in Great Britain on 1 April 1992. Its headquarters and training staff will form before that date. It is our proposal that the new guard service, which will be formed from the Department's various existing civilian guard forces, comprising guarding, patrolling and watching grades, together with new entrants, will have a common uniform, common professional standards, common pay and conditions of service, a common staffing structure and common centralised training. The guard service will contribute fully to the mix of service, Ministry of Defence Police and civilian guard forces dedicated to the security of the Department. The guards' new pay scales and conditions of service will be appropriate to the work which they will be required to do.

While commanding officers and heads of establishment will remain responsible for the command and control of the guards at their units, the professional management of the guard service as a whole will be the responsibility of the chief constable of the Ministry of Defence Police, with a professional head of guard service reporting to him. Training will be provided at the MDP Police Training school and the Royal Military Police training centre by MDP, service and civilian instructors. Professional standards and entry qualifications will be set by the chief constable and monitored by his regional staff, who will be based in the regions and answerable to the head of guard service. There is no present intention that any members of the guard service should be armed. Consultations about the new arrangements are proceeding with the trade unions concerned. It is the Government's intention that the new guard service should build on the excellent work done by our present guards; and that it should become the fully professional, well-trained and well-equipped service that the high terrorist threat requires.

Over-the-Horizon Radar

Mr. Aspinwall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there have been any developments in his plan to conduct a trial of a relocatable over-the-horizon radar in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I announced on 30 March 1990, at columns 328-9 that we had decided in principle to undertake, in collaboration with the United States, a trial of the potential value of a relocatable over-the-horizon radar in the United Kingdom. Following my right hon. Friend's statement on Options for Change on 25 July 1990 at columns 470-88, we have been reviewing our equipment plans and have decided not to proceed with this project.

HEALTH

Dentures

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is (a) the average amount paid by patients for the provision of dentures under the national health service and (b) the amount paid to dentists for the laboratory content of their fee for the provision of dentures in the categories (i) complete acrylic dentures, (ii) one to three tooth partial acrylic dentures, (iii) four to eight tooth partial dentures, (iv) nine to 13 tooth partial acrylic dentures, (v) one to three tooth partial chrome cobalt dentures, (vi) four to eight tooth partial chrome cobalt dentures and (viii) complete chrome cobalt dentures.

Mr. Dorrell: Information is not available on the average amount paid by patients for the provision of dentures under the national health service. The table shows the amounts which are attributed to dental laboratory costs in the fees paid to dentists for the national health service treatments listed in the current scale of fees which came into effect on 1 October 1990.

Dentures in synthetic resin (including all necessary backing and tagging)

Full upper and full lower dentures	47·00
Partial denture bearing:
One, two or three teeth	18·44
Four to eight teeth	27·04
Nine or more teeth	33·98

Metal based dentures (excluding backing)

Plate design partial denture bearing:
One, two or three teeth	64·58
Four to eight teeth	73·68
Nine to twelve teeth	74·98
Skeleton design partial denture with single connecting bar bearing:
One, two or three teeth	65·47
Four to ten teeth	72·97
Skeleton design partial denture with multiple connecting bars bearing:
One, two or three teeth	70·11
Four to ten teeth	77·40
Full upper or full lower denture in chrome cobalt or stainless steel	57·24

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what criteria are used by his Department for the control of the quality of dentures provided under the national health service by dentists and dental laboratories.

Mr. Dorrell: Dentures should be made of first quality material and to the highest standards of dental laboratory practice. The Department supports the activities of the certification authority for dental laboratories and suppliers and also distributes to dentists in the NHS information to assist them in selecting the most suitable materials.

The Department approves brand name products on the basis of their compliance with national and international standards and funds a number of projects concerned with the quality of dental laboratory work.

The clinician is responsible for quality of work used on the patient. This work is monitored by the Dental Practice Board through the dental reference service.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the new cases of oral cancer reported each year can be held to arise from the wearing of dentures.

Mr. Dorrell: We are not aware of any evidence which would establish a positive correlation between oral cancer and the wearing of dentures.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the pathological conditions, of which 50 per cent. of denture wearers have shown evidence, have been malignant or pre-malignant.

Mr. Dorrell: We know of no scientifically based epidemiological survey or report which suggests that 50 per cent. of denture wearers in England suffer from pathological conditions or the oral mucosa.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of complaint arising from the provision of dentures were investigated by dental service committees during the most recent five years; and how many complaints regarding the provision of dentures were taken through to judgment by family practitioner committees during the most recent five years.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is not available centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dentists

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the figure of target average net income payable to dentists under the national health service as set by the Dental Rates Study Group.

Mr. Dorrell: Target average net income—TANI—for general dental practitioners is determined by the Government in the light of recommendations from the independent Doctors' and Dentists' Review Body. For 1991-92, the Government accepted the review body's recommendation but decided to implement it in two stages. The effect has been the equivalent of setting TANI at the rate of £31,970 per annum for the period 1 April 1991 to 30 November 1991, with implementation of the full TANI of £33,010 per annum, as recommended by the review body, from 1 December 1991.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists have withdrawn from the provision of dental treatment under the national health service since the introduction of the new dental contract.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) on 16 April at columns 151-58.

Information is not available in the form requested. Between 1 October 1990, the date the new contract was introduced, and 28 February 1991, the latest date for which figures are available, there was a net decrease of 115, less than 0·7 per cent., in the total number of entries on family health services authority, FHSA, dental lists. A dentist may be on more than one list.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Functions which are commonly associated with press and public relations are carried out by the Department's information division.

Figures for 1 April 1989 to 1 April 1991 are given in the table:

Information for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 is not available in the form requested.

Date	Staff in post	Complement
1 April 1989	31	52·0
1 April 1990	52	57·0
1 April 1991	54	62·5

Thirty-three of the staff currently employed are information officers.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the HEA/HEC.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Donald Maitland, the chairman of the Health Education Authority, for details.

South East Thames RHA

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library the document submitted to his Department by South East Thames regional health authority about projected activity levels for 1991-92 for hospitals and districts in that region.

Mr. Dorrell: South East Thames regional health authority has submitted to the Department a plan for 1991-92, putting forward its key objectives for the year together with supporting information setting out planned levels of activity to be purchased for residents of the region. This has yet to be agreed.

Nursing Prescribing

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in commissioning the cost-benefit analysis recommended in the recent report on nurse prescribing.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have commissioned the consultants Touche Ross to assess the costs and benefits of allowing nurses working in the community who have a district nurse or health visitor qualification to prescribe from a limited formulary. For the purposes of this work, the illustrative formulary in the report of the advisory group on nurse prescribing is being used. The consultants have been asked to include in their assessment the resource effects of potential changes in the volume and type of drugs etc. prescribed and in pharmacists' dispensing fees, any additional training required, necessary administrative arrangements and any changes in the time worked by nurses and general practitioners. The results are due by the end of of August.

PRIME MINISTER

Overseas Aid

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister how much extra would be needed each year for the United Kingdom to meet its United Nations target on overseas aid over the next five years.

The Prime Minister: Under the public expenditure survey system, plans for expenditure on the aid programme have only been made up to 1993-94. Forecasts for nominal gross national product are available only to 1994-95. However, on present trends, to reach the United Nations target of 0·7 per cent. of GNP spent on official development assistance would require a total aid programme of some £5·2 billion in 1995-96, £3·3 billion greater than the presently planned aid programme for 1993-94.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Prime Minister's Office.

The Prime Minister: Seven people including support staff were employed in 10 Downing street on 1 April 1991 on press and public relations activities. There is one vacant post at present. Detailed figures were not recorded separately prior to 1987-88; since then the total staff complement has remained at eight. The complement for 1991-92 is eight.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Cabinet Office.

The Prime Minister: The number of staff employed on press and public relations activities in the Cabinet Office on 1 April each year is as follows:

	Number
1984	12
1985	12
1986	11
1987	10
1988	10
1989	10
1990	7
1991	7

There were no vacant posts in any year.

Similar information for the years prior to 1984 is not available.

South Africa

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he received and from whom concerning British policy towards South Africa prior to his meeting with President de Klerk on 22 April 1991.

The Prime Minister: I have received representations from a number of hon. Members, trades unions and organisations with an interest in British policy towards South Africa.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister whether he raised with Mr. de Klerk at their meeting on 22 April the failure of the South African Government to take legislative action to repeal the Internal Security Act and other repressive security laws as required under the United Nations declaration on South Africa of December 1989.

The Prime Minister: The South African Government are currently conducting a review of all such legislation, including the Internal Security Act. I did not discuss this specific issue. However, we have often stressed to the South African Government the need to repeal those legislative provisions, such as detention without trial, which are contrary to international norms of human rights.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister whether he raised with Mr. de Klerk at their meeting on 22 April the need for him to implement the agreement he made on 6 August 1990 that all political prisoners would be released by 30 April 1991.

The Prime Minister: We discussed progress on the implementation of the agreement of 6 August 1990 reached between the South African Government and the African National Congress. President de Klerk reaffirmed his Government's commitment on the release of political prisoners.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister whether he raised with Mr. de Klerk at their meeting on 22 April the need for him to implement the agreement for the granting of indemnity for political exiles by 30 April.

The Prime Minister: We discussed arrangements for the granting of indemnity for political exiles. President de Klerk reaffirmed the South African Government's commitment to implement arrangements agreed between the South African Government and the African National Congress.

WALES

Education Service

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimates or statistics he has on the cost of insurance premiums paid and claims made by education authorities in Wales in relation to teacher absence through sickness in 1988, 1989, 1990.

Sir Wyn Roberts: No information is available.

A483 and A470

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will visit Mongomeryshire for a consultative meeting with local government and community representatives concerning his Department's future strategy for the A483 and A470 roads; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have no plans to do so. The Government's policy for improving the A483 and A470 routes is clearly set out in "Roads in Wales: Progress and Plans for the 1990s" published in 1989 and the supplement published earlier this year.

Welshpool Bypass

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will announce the proposed starting date for construction of the Welshpool bypass.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Work is planned to start in the current financial year as indicated in the 1991 departmental report published in February. I cannot be more precise at this stage.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Iraq (Refugees)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list how many officials from the Overseas Development Administration have visited concentrations of refugees on either side of the borders between (a) Iraq and Turkey and (b) Iraq and Iran, since 27 March.

Mrs. Chalker: Officials from the British embassies in Ankara and Tehran have made regular visits to both areas. The Overseas Development Administration's chief medical adviser, Dr. Nabarro, also visited Turkey from 9-14 April. He accompanied the Minister for Overseas Development and her team, including two officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Overseas Development Administration, on a visit to Turkey and Iran from 18-21 April. Dr. Nabarro is now based in Turkey as the United Kingdom's co-ordinator of the relief effort, and is supported by a member of the British embassy in Ankara.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each date since 3 April, what tonnage of aid was delivered into the hands of Iraqi refugees in areas on both sides of the borders between (a) Iraq and Turkey and (b) Iraq and Iran.

Mrs. Chalker: The tonnage of aid, delivered by RAF C130 Hercules and Chinook helicopter airdrops to the refugees on the Turkish border with Iraq up to 24 April was as follows:

Date	C130s	Chinooks
8 April	10·3	—
10 April	31·0	—
11 April	21·1	—
12 April	20·5	—
13 April	19·2	—
14 April	18·3	—
15 April	17·3	—
17 April	9·3	—
18 April	22·8	—
19 April	25·4	—
20 April	20·5	—
21 April	27·1	[1]10
22 April	[1]23·4	[1]30
23 April	[1]23·4	[1]30
24 April	[1]23·4	[1]30
Total	313·0	[1]100

[1] Denotes estimate.

We estimate that, as of 23 April, allied cargo planes and helicopters had delivered 5,915 tonnes of relief supplies as a whole—4,056 tonnes from United States, 921 tonnes from United Kingdom, 252 tonnes from France, 179 tonnes from Canada, 476 tonnes from Germany, and 31 tonnes from Italy—to sites along the Turkey-Iraq border. Daily totals for other donors are not available. Further supplies from donors have been distributed by the Turkish Red Crescent.

As of 25 April, an estimated total of 240 tonnes of aid supplies have been flown by the Overseas Development Administration to Iran. Onward delivery has been carried out by the Iranian Red Crescent. Daily totals of supplies delivered to the refugees are not available.

Minister for Overseas Development (Engagements)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the official engagements of the Minister for Overseas Development for each day since Tuesday 26 March.

Mrs. Chalker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, since 26 March my time has been increasingly taken up with matters concerning relief to the Iraqi refugees. This situation has continued on a daily basis regardless of any other official or private business and has been maintained by telephone and facsimile line during periods when I was out of the country.

My main official engagements since 26 March, excluding a large number of meetings and other official engagements, are as follows:

On Tuesday 26 March I met the Kenyan Finance Minister and Vice-President, hosted a reception for the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development and attended European Standing Committee B for its debate on African, Caribbean and Pacific countries' debt.

On Wednesday 27 March I met the British Red Cross official dealing with the Iraqi refugees and addressed the London chamber of commerce.

On Monday 8 April I met the British High Commissoner from Kampala and our ambassador designate for Peking as well as the French ambassador, with whom I discussed European Bank for Reconstruction and Development matters and Iraqi refugee needs.

On 9 and 10 April I met with senior officials in the State Department and the National Security Council in Washington.

On 11 April I met with the UN Secretary-General.

On Monday 15 April with the Secretary of State I held meetings with representatives of non-governmental organisations dealing with assistance for Iraqi refugees and attended the inauguration and the main business session of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

On Tuesday 16 April I met the Presidents of Tanzania and Cyprus, the French Overseas Development Minister and our ambassadors to Zaire and Senegal. I also addressed the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development meeting and made arrangements for the Turkey-Iran visit.

On Wednesday 17 April I had meetings with the West Indian commission, and the Sudanese Finance Minister. I also gave evidence to the Foreign Affairs Committee on our assistance for Iraqi refugees among other subjects.

I visited Turkey and Iran between 18 and 21 April.

On Monday 22 April I called on the President of the Republic of South Africa. I had a meeting with the head of the British Red Cross. I answered oral questions in the House and made a statement on Iraqi refugees.

Overseas Aid

NORTHERN IRELAND

Flying Boat (Shore Facilities)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider protecting from unsuitable development the remaining flying boat shore facilities.

Mr. Needham: Yes. The fact that a site has been used as a flying boat facility would be taken into account in the processing of a planning application by the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland. Following a request from the Lough Erne Aviation museum, the Department is currently considering the statutory listing of the slipway and concrete service bays at Goblusk bay, Lower Lough Erne.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many old flying boat shore facilities are undeveloped.

Mr. Needham: The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland is aware of at least three sites where some facilities for flying boats still remain. A comprehensive list of such sites is not kept by the Department.

Electricity Industry

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list each consultant's report commissioned by his Department relating to Northern Ireland Electricity in the past two years, with the fees paid in each case, and the total of consultancy fees paid.

Mr. Needham: The information sought is as follows:

Consultant and title of report	Fees paid £
Coopers and Lybrand Competition and interconnection study	154,851
Coopers and Lybrand Review of NIE performance aims 1989-90	14,732
Coopers and Lybrand Review of NIE performance aims 1990-91	18,814
PJR Management Organisation Consultants NIE organisational capability review	52,225
Ewbank Preece Ltd. Inspection of generating plant at Belfast West and Coolkeeragh	3,898
Touche Ross Advance long form report	140,320
Touche Ross Supplementary privatisation study	8,173
Ewbank Preece Ltd. Development of power station site	[1]—

[1] Not yet paid.

Total fees paid to consultants (including those advising the Department of Economic Development on the privatisation of Northern Ireland Electricity) in the two years to 31 March 1991 were £3,582,418.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what representations he has had from members of the board of Northern Ireland Electricity on the effect of restructuring the industry;

(2) what representations he had from the former chairman of Northern Ireland Electricity during his term of office on the privatisation of the industry.

Mr. Needham: The Government consulted the chairman and board of Northern Ireland Electricity in drawing up their proposals to privatise the industry. In responding to these proposals, the board made known its preference for NIE to be privatised as a single entity with strong regulation but accepted the Government's objectives in privatising the industry and committed itself to make the new structure a success.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will postpone the privatisation of Northern Ireland Electricity; and if he will establish an inquiry into the stewardship of the chief executive of Northern Ireland Electricity from the time of his appointment to date.

Mr. Needham: No. Privatisation of Northern Ireland Electricity will further strengthen the Northern Ireland economy by laying the foundation for a more efficient electricity supply industry and there is no reason to postpone it. The day-to-day management of Northern Ireland Electricity is a matter for its board, in which the Government's confidence remains unaltered.

Local Government Finance

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show the rate struck by each council in Northern Ireland for the 1991-92 financial year, the percentage increase and the cash increase in each case and also the same information for the regional rate indicating the reduction for each council area and for the regional rate as a result of the Budget statement by the Chancellor of the the Exchequer.

Dr. Mawhinney: The normal regional rate for 1991-92 —that is, that payable by the non-domestic sector—was not changed following the Budget statement and stands at the figure of 165·40 p which was announced on 7 March 1991, an increase of 17·13 p or 11·55 per cent. on 1990-91. The reduction given to domestic ratepayers was increased by 82 p following the Budget statement, from 12 p to 94 p. Compared with 1990-91, the regional rate for domestic ratepayers has been reduced by 64·87 p or 47·60 per cent. The following table gives the district council rates and the overall rates, regional and district, payable in each district council area by non-domestic and domestic ratepayers for 1991-92 and comparisons with 1990-91.

	District rate			Regional (non-domestic) and district rate			Regional (domestic) and district rate

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Conciliation Service

Mr. Gregory: To ask Mr. Attorney-General, what is the Government's policy with regard to the Family Conciliation Service; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Government recognise the valuable contribution made in the area of family law by conciliation services. The Government are at present reviewing all aspects of divorce reform and conciliation is under review as part of that review.

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Attorney-General what is the level of Government funding for the principal family conciliation services; if he will list this by name of service and date since 1979-80; and whether he plans to conduct a reappraisal of its support for these agencies.

The Attorney-General: Other than the funding by the Home Office of the Bristol courts family conciliation service in 1982-83 and 1983-84, no direct or specific central Government funding is or has ever been available for conciliation services, although indirect help is provided through the courts, the probation service and the legal aid fund in some cases. The Government are reviewing the future of, and funding for, conciliation services as part of their consideration of proposals to reform the divorce law.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Lord Chancellor's Department.

The Attorney-General: As at 1 April 1991, there were six permanent staff employed in the press office of the Lord Chancellor's Department. Since that date, the number of staff in post has increased to seven, four of whom are members of the Government information service.

	Staff in post
1984-85	1
1985-86	2
1986-87	3
1987-88	5
1988-89	6
1989-90	6
1990-91	[1]6

[1] and one on secondment from another Government Department for six months.

For the years up to 1985-86 the staff in post were the same as the complement. In 1986-87 complements were abolished, but the authorised staff levels since that date have been the same as the staff in post.

There were no such staff employed in the period up to 1983-84.

Crown Prosecution Service (Vacancies)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Attorney-General how many vacancies there were for professionally qualified staff in the Crown prosecution service on 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I have taken the hon. Gentleman's question to be confined to lawyer vacancies.

On 1 April 1991, there were 323·3 vacancies for lawyers in the Crown prosecution service against 1,800 lawyers in post, representing a welcome reduction from 23 per cent. to 15 per cent. over the previous year.

Divorce

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Attorney-General what is the estimated cost to the Exchequer of divorce in terms of legal costs.

The Attorney-General: The net amount of legal aid paid for divorce, and related matters, in England and Wales during 1989-90 was £117,397,000.

EMPLOYMENT

Training

Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many places for (i) employment training and (ii) youth training were available in 1990-91; and how many places are expected to be available in 1991-92.

Mr. Jackson: For 1990-91 there were 215,000 places available for people eligible for employment training and 380,000 places available for young people eligible for youth training. The provision of places in 1991-92 is a matter for training and enterprise councils.

Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many youth training places are available in England and Wales; and how many 16 and 17-year-olds are registered as seeking a place.

Mr. Jackson: Information on the number of youth training places available or the number of 16 and 17-year-olds seeking places in England and Wales is not held centrally.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Robson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, (1) the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department;

(2) the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Training Agency and the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is given in the table below:

1990-91	120·0	126·0
1991-92	119·0	115·5

Figures for 1988-89 are for Training Agency's information branch services branch only. Figures for the Department of Employment are not available. Figures for 1989-90 onwards represent the total numbers for the Department's information branch. The branch was formed during 1989 by merging the Department of Employment's information division and the Training Agency's information services branch.

Earnings

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the proportion of (a) males, (b) females and (c) all workers in the county of Northumberland earning less than (a) £100 per week, (b) £120 per week, (c) £150 per week, (d) £180 per week and (e) £200 per week at the latest available date.

Mr. Jackson: The information available from the new earnings survey is given in the following table:

Mr. MacGregor: Any such proposal would be considered by the Services Committee.

Victoria Tower (Cleaning)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Lord President of the Council, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Newport, West of 22 April, Official Report, column 300, what is his estimate of the total costs of the cleaning operation on the Victoria Tower.

Mr. John MacGregor: The estimated cost of the project to repair and restore the stonework of the Victoria Tower, being undertaken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is £7·5 million.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Head Teachers

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he advises local education authorities and school governing bodies to consider as a relevant consideration any inspector's report on a shortlisted candidate for appointment as a head teacher.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has not issued formal guidance on procedures to be adopted by local education authorities and governing bodies when selecting head teachers. This is a matter for the individual governing bodies and LEAs concerned. However, the Department has commissioned a school governor training package which gives guidance on good practice in making staff appointments, including the use of references.

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the spending per head for secondary school pupils and the proportion of eligible pupils obtaining grades A-C in GCSE, for the most recent year, for all English counties.

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the current salaries of members of the directing staff at Birmingham polytechnic.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This information is not available to the Department.

Degree Courses

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to introduce two-year degree courses.

Mr. Alan Howarth: No. Course design and content are essentially for individual universities, polytechnics and colleges to consider. Institutions will however need to review what they offer, including where appropriate the balance between two year sub-degree courses and longer degree level courses, in responding to the increased demand from a more diverse student body.

Polytechnics

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the formula for determining the salaries of the directing staff of polytechnics.

Mr. Alan Howarth: There is no formula: the salaries of these staff are set as part of individual contracts.

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science using the latest figures, if he will show, for each English county, what proportion of standard spending assessment for education is being spent and what proportion of the education budget is being retained for administration, in rank order.

Mr. Fallon: The latest available figures showing the amount that each shire county authority budgeted to spend on education compared with the education element of their standard spending assessment in 1990-91 are given in the following table. Information about the proportion of the education budget that each authority retains for administration is not held centrally.

Mr. Alan Howarth: No. It is for the universities to settle these matters through the universities academic salaries committees.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from Mr. Mark A. Santos, vice-president of Hull university union, with responsibility for education and welfare, on the subject of the withdrawal of the students' vacation hardship allowance; and what reply he has sent.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Representations have been received from Mr. Santos and an official reply, explaining the reasons for withdrawing the allowance, will be made to him shortly.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the date, purpose and location of all meetings held between Wandsworth city technology college and the principal sponsor, ADT plc.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have no detailed information and require none. Such meetings are a matter for the principal sponsor and the college.

East Birmingham Task Force

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how often the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education has met or visited the East Birmingham task force.

Mr. Alan Howarth: During the course of my various visits to Birmingham I have so far visited the area of the task force four times, and I shall be visiting there again shortly. I have had two other meetings with the task force leader.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Special Car Tax

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to abolish the special car tax.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have no plans to abolish car tax.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what reasons underlie the delay in publishing figures for import penetration in the Central Statistical Office's monthly digest of statistics; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures for the years 1989 and 1990 together with the corresponding figures for imports from the EC.

Mr. Maples: Import penetration figures published in the latest monthly digest of statistics are the most up-to-date. As a result of recommendations in the 1989 review of Department of Trade and Industry statistics which considered the arrangements for collection of economic statistics by DTI and the burdens placed on businesses, quarterly sales data for most manufacturing industries, which are used in the calculation of this ratio, are no longer collected. Data for 1989 and 1990 are therefore not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what reasons underlie the delay in publishing figures for the exchange rate and other countries' export values for manufactures in the monthly review of external trade statistics.

Mr. Maples: The delay in publishing exchange rates in table F1 of the monthly review of external trade statistics was the result of an oversight which occurred during the changeover to a new computer system; however, this data is widely available in other publications including "Economic Trends". Up-to-date information was published in the April 1991 edition of the review. The delay in the publication, in table E2 of the review, of main manufacturing countries—MMCs—shares of exports arises because the calculation of the shares requires statistics for manufacturing exports for all MMCs. While statistics on exports of manufactures are available for most MMCs within a few months of the period to which they relate, some countries' statistics are not available until much later.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the amount invested by business in 1989 compared to 1979; how much was invested by manufacturing other than food, drink and tobacco; how much was invested, in each case, in plant and machinery; and what the cost would have been in each of the four cases of constant allowances in 1989 and the 1979 notes.

Mr. Mellor: The table provides the available comparisons.

Business investment

Petrol Prices

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, pursuant to his answer of 19 April, Official Report, column 272, he will give the estimated effects on petrol prices in the United Kingdom if the European Commission's minimum rates of duty for mineral oils are accepted; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Our rates of duty for petrol are currently above the proposed European Community minimum rates. If the minimum rates were to be accepted this would not affect petrol prices in the United Kingdom.

Inward Investment

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total net direct inward investment in the United Kingdom from overseas in 1990 for each quarter; and which countries were the main sources of such investment.

Mr. Mellor: The figures are published in table A9, on direct investments in the March issue of "Economic Trends", published by the Central Statistical Office. A country analysis of the quarterly estimates is not available. However a geographical analysis is available for cross-border acquisitions and mergers by overseas companies in the United Kingdom in 1990. This is published in table 7 of Business Bulletin 23/91 "Cross border acquisitions and mergers (Q4 1990)". Copies of both publications are in the Library. It should be noted that cross-border acquisitions and mergers do not always give rise to direct investment capital flows and direct investment may be in forms other than acquisitions.

Tax Office

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he makes of any additional cost involved in a separate tax office dealing with the tax affairs of a non-working spouse.

Mr. Maude: None.

The tax office in which the tax affairs of non-working spouses are handled depends on their individual circumstances: for example, if they receive an occupational pension, it is the tax office dealing with that pension scheme; if they have investment income liable to tax it is their local tax office; and where the individual is claiming a repayment of tax suffered on investment income, the claim will be handled in one of the new Inland Revenue offices specialising in this work. These arrangements are the most cost-effective way to provide a good all-round service to taxpayers.

Where the tax office is remote from the person's home, any personal inquiries can be directed to the local tax inquiry centre.

Earnings

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table giving (a) rates of inflation, (b) growth in gross domestic product, (c) growth in gross domestic product less oil, (d) manufacturing output, (e) employment, (f) real average earnings for the whole economy and (g) real average earnings for manual workers for (i) France and (ii) the United Kingdom, for each year since 1985.

Mr. Maples: The latest available information can be obtained from the following publications:

(a) rates of inflation

Separate tables showing consumer price indices are given in both countries in "Main Economic Indicators Historical Statistics 1969-1988" and in part I (indicators by subject) in the monthly "Main Economic Indicators" both published by OECD. (b) growth in gross domestic product and (c) growth in gross domestic product less oil. Part III (appendix) in "Main Economic Indicators" published monthly by OECD gives GDP for both countries. Data on a comparable basis are not available for gross domestic product excluding oil.

(d) manufacturing output

"Industrial Trends Theme 4 Series B" published monthly by Eurostat contains the latest data for both countries.

(e) employment

Information on occupied population is given in table O in "National Accounts ESA Aggregates 1970-1988 Theme 2 Series C" published by Eurostat.

(f) real average earnings for the whole economy and (g) real average earnings for manual workers.

Information on compensation of employees which includes all payments in cash and in kind made by employers in remuneration for the work done by their employees is given in Table J in "National Accounts ESA Aggregates 1970-1988 Theme 2 Series C" published by "Eurostat". Data in respect of manual workers are not separately available.

Copies of all these publications are available in the Library of the House.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Treasury.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The number of press and public relations staff employed in my Department on 1 April, with the full budgeted provision shown in brackets was as follows:

	Staff
1986-87	10 (12)
1987-88	10 (10)
1988-89	10 (10)
1989-90	10 (10)
1990-91	10 (10)
1991-92	9 (9)

The information for earlier years is not available in the form requested and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Trusts

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the relationship between the £100 million in lost revenue that the Chancellor referred to in his Budget statement under the section dealing with trusts, Official Report, 19 March, column 174 and the figure of £10 million that is shown in the Red Book on page 45 in table 4·1 against item 45, "Non-Resident Trusts: Anti-Avoidance Measures".

Mr. Maude: The figure of £10 million in table 4·1 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Review" is the expected increase in receipts in 1992-93 from the measures concerning non-resident trusts in the Finance Bill. The annex to the table states that, without these measures, there could be a significant loss of tax: this loss was estimated, by my rt. hon. Friend in his Budget statement, to be up to £100 million in a full year.

P11D Forms

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many P11D forms for the year 1989-90 have not yet been processed by the Inland Revenue; and how many taxpayers are estimated to be affected by these forms.

Mr. Maude: Approximately 120,000 remain to be examined. Nearly all of these are for separate individuals and are returns for 1989-90.

Income Tax

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the gross amount of assessed income tax excluding PAYE and unassessed companies payments collectable for 1988-89; how much had been assessed by 31 July 1989; how much had been remitted by 31 October 1989; and how much had been stood over or suspended by 31 October 1989.

Mr. Maude: The amount of assessed income tax excluding PAYE and unassessed companies' payments collectable for the accounts year ended 31 October 1989 was £11,489.3 million.

The amount stood over in the year ended 31 October 1989 and not included in the above was £5,188.7 million.

The amount of assessed income tax excluding PAYE and unassessed companies payments remitted in the year ended 31 October 1989 was £227.6 million, although most if not all of this would relate to assessments raised in earlier years.

The amount of tax assessed by 31 July 1989 cannot be ascertained as the Inland Revenue do not hold such figures on a month-by-month basis.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the collectable balance of assessed income tax excluding PAYE and unassessed companies' payments at 31 July 1989; how much of this collectable balance was remitted during the period from 1 August to 31 October 1989; and how much of this collectable balance was stood over or suspended during the period from 1 August to 31 October 1989.

Mr. Maude: These figures for part years cannot be obtained as the Inland Revenue only makes up accounts for the whole year, ending on the last Friday in October.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Treasury on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 25 April 1991]: The expenditure for 1988-89 was £49,310, that for 1989-90 was £52,486 and that for 1990-91 was £43,581, none of which was on television or radio advertising. The 1991-92 budget is £53,693 none of which is likely to be on television or radio advertising.

Comparable figures for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 are not available because of machinery of Government changes and could only be given at disproportionate cost.

Duty Free Shopping

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report the representations he has received concerning the proposed abolition of duty free shopping in the single European market; what replies he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 25 April 1991]: In the past 15 months, Treasury Ministers have replied to over 100 letters and several parliamentary questions and have held six meetings with representative trade bodies, including two with the Duty-Free Confederation.

Although no specific proposals have been put forward, the European Commission has made clear its view that, as a consequence of the completion of the single market, duty-free shopping for travellers within the Community should cease.

The Government understand the Commission's view, but equally are aware of the significance of the duty-free trade for United Kingdom producers, vendors and the transport industry in general. We are examining very carefully all the evidence put to us in representations, and hope to be able to announce our view shortly.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which medical and paramedical toiletries attract VAT.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 25 April 1991]: Toiletries are normally chargeable with the standard rate of VAT. However, goods prescribed for the treatment of a patient by a registered medical practitioner and dispensed by a registered pharmaceutical chemist are zero-rated.

THE ARTS

Items in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Minister for the Arts if there have been any items accepted in lieu of tax or allocated since his last announcement on 31 January, Official Report, column 584.

Mr. Renton: Since that announcement, I am pleased to inform the House that five further offers have been accepted. These consist of a collection of paintings and drawings by Alexander Runciman, a collection of papers relating to the geologist George Bellas Greenough, a watercolour by Whistler, a collection of musical instruments and two paintings by Nasmyth. These offers satisfied £196,000, £26,600, £7,000, £126,956 and £56,000 tax respectively. No decision has yet been taken on the allocation of these items except for the Nasmyth paintings, which will go to the Whitworth art gallery, Manchester in accordance with the condition on which the offer was made.

I am also pleased to announce the allocation of three offers previously accepted in lieu of tax. A painting by Sickert entitled "Girl at a Window, Little Rachel", will be allocated to the Tate gallery, a collection of works by and relating to John Piper will go to the Wolverhampton art gallery and a collection of photographs by and of Cecil Beaton will go to the National Portrait gallery.

CIVIL SERVICE

Colin Wallace

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he will issue a statement on the acknowledgment by the Civil Service Appeal Board that it was approached by Ministry of Defence representatives over the Colin Wallace affair.

Mr. Renton: That private communications took place between representatives of the Ministry of Defence and the chairman of the hearing before Mr. Wallace's appeal to the Civil Service Appeal Board is not in dispute. The Government accept that the communications should not have occurred; and the present chairman of the Civil Service Appeal Board has confirmed that it is not the board's practice to engage in private discussions with Departments in advance of an appeal hearing about matters which may be material to the outcome of the appeal and that it would refuse to entertain any request to engage in such discussions.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Arms Exports

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many licences were (a) applied for and (b) granted under the export control system of the Department of Trade and Industry for arms exports in each year since 1980.

Mr. Sainsbury: Separate statistics are not maintained for the export of arms. Export licence applications received and granted for all military equipment for the years 1987 to 1990 and for the first quarter of 1991 were as follows:

Year	Applications Received	Licences Granted
1987	17,590	16,745
1988	15,697	[2]16,005
1989	14,601	13,584
1990	14,996	14,603
[3]1991	3,313	2,993

[1] Figures include applications for temporary export.
[2] Carry-over of applications from 1987.
[3] First quarter.

Statistics were not maintained in this form before 1987 and could only be compiled at disproportionate cost.

About one third of the above totals represents licences for firearms for personal, Government and police use.

Iraqi Currency

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will now allow companies in the United Kingdom to tender for the production of Iraqi currency; and when he last refused permission for companies to produce Iraqi currency.

Mr. Sainsbury: It is up to companies to decide whether they wish to tender for this business. However, it is not our present policy to grant licences in such cases. One company has recently sought advice about the possibility of obtaining a licence.

Optical Manufacturing Market

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the estimated size of the optical manufacturing market in the years ended (a) 31 March 1989 and (b) 31 March 1990.

Mr. Leigh: The latest available figures are for the year to December 1989. Estimates for that year and for 1988 as shown as follows:

United Kingdom market[1]

£ million

Industry[2]	1988	1989
Spectacles and unmounted lenses	230	272
Optical precision instruments	212	185
Photographic and cinematographic equipment	661	683
	1,103	1,140

[1] United Kingdom figures devised by manufacturers' sales less exports plus imports.
[2] Activity headings 3731, 3732 and 3733 respectively of the standard industrial classification.

Car Trade

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the changes in volume of car exports and of car imports over the past year; and what has been the effect on the balance of payments.

Mr. Sainsbury: Information in the volume of car and taxi exports and imports is regularly published in the monthly statistical review of the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, available in the House of Commons Library. The balance of trade in cars and taxis narrowed from minus £5,008 million in 1989, to minus £4,175 million in 1990, a reduction of £833 million.

SIM's Law

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations have been made (a) to him and (b) him about Italy's SIM's law.

Mr. Redwood: The International Stock Exchange wrote to me on 21 January drawing my attention to the law, and it has kept in touch with my Department. The ISE, the Securities and Investments Board and my Department have all made strong representations to the Italian authorities about the effects of the law on United Kingdom firms wishing to do investment business in Italy. The law may be in breach of the treaty of Rome and the Government are considering asking the Commission to take this up with the Italian authorities.

Newspapers

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will ask the Office of Fair Trading to review restrictive practices affecting the distribution and sale of daily and Sunday newpapers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The Director General of Fair Trading is currently conducting a review of a number of issues concerning the distribution of newspapers. The Director General will decide in the light of this review whether further action under the competition legislation for which he is responsible is required. It would not be appropriate for me to comment in advance of the completion of the Director General's review.

GATT

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how negotiations on the future of the multi-fibre arrangement and GATT round are progressing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The future of the multi-fibre arrangement pending the conclusion of the Uruguay round is to be addressed by a meeting of the textiles committee in Geneva scheduled for 16 May. The Community has recently begun to discuss the details of the mandate which will guide the Commission in that negotiation. All member states have agreed that a 17-month extension of the MFA should be sought. In the wider GATT negotiations, we hope that the good progress which was made towards a satisfactory textiles agreement at Brussels last December can be maintained now that the talks have resumed.

Football Premier League

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer the proposed football premier league to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Redwood: No. Any agreement between organisations and clubs may, however, constitute a registrable agreement under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976. This would be a matter for the Director General of Fair Trading.

The Gulf (Arms Sales)

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was his Department's allocation, in each of the last five years, to that part of the British Overseas Trade Board charged with encouraging arms sales to countries in the Gulf.

Mr. Sainsbury: None. The British Overseas Trade Board has no remit specifically to promote defence sales and there is no part of the board charged with encouraging arms sales.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the budget allocated by the British Overseas Trade Board for exporters of military equipment taking part in past arms fairs in Baghdad, Iraq for (a) travel, (b) accommodation, (c) exhibition stands, (d) shipping costs and (e) in total; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: My Department has never provided financial support for companies attending the Baghdad arms fair.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the budget allocated by the British Overseas Trade Board for exporters of military equipment taking part in (i) Dubai '91, (ii) Arabian security and technology exhibition, Riyadh, September 1991, (iii) International Defence Equipment and Aviation, Ankara, 13 November 1991 and (iv) Middle East defence exhibition, Bahrain 1992 (a) for travel, (b) for hotel or accommodation, (c) for exhibition stands, (d) for shipping costs and (e) in total; and if he will make a statement as to the entitlement of exhibitors to apply for a share of that money.

Mr. Sainsbury: There is no separate budget for exporters of military equipment.

Support provided by my Department for companies participating in British groups at certain overseas trade fairs takes the form of the provision of stands at subsidised rates and contribution to the travel costs of up to two company representatives attending the fair. No provision is made for hotel or accommodation or for shipping costs.

Car Prices

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to equalise British car retail prices with those charged elsewhere in the EC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: The Monopolies and Mergers Commission is currently investigating the United Kingdom car market, including car prices in the United Kingdom. When the Commission's report is available, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will need to consider whether there is scope for any action in the light of it.

Iraq and Libya (Arms Supplies)

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will obtain a copy of the special report commissioned by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre on western suppliers of unconventional weapons and technologies to Iraq and Libya, for his Department's library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 24 April 1991]: My Department obtained a copy of the report last year. The report consists of information obtained from various press sources. Her Majesty's Government were aware of the information contained in the report on British companies.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Convention on the Rights of the Child

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 21 March, Official Report, column 192-93, to the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), if he will detail the reasons why the United Kingdom has not yet ratified the United Nations convention on the rights of the child; and if he is now able to state when it is Her Majesty's Government's intention to do so.

Mr. Hogg: In the reply of 21 March given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) we announced the United Kingdom mainland position in respect of the convention. We are considering with the United Kingdom islands and dependent territories their positions and when these have been established we will ratify the convention.

Polish Resettlement Act 1946

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to reach a decision on implementing some assistance under the Polish Resettlement Act 1947.

Mr. Forth: I have been asked to reply.

The Polish Resettlement Act 1947 was passed to enable the Government of the day to look after the welfare of members of the Polish armed forces and their dependents, in recognition of their gallant service alongside their British allies in the second world war, and Polish civilian refugees.

It enabled several Government Ministries to provide help for those Poles who elected to remain in this country and seek employment, or with arrangements and financial assistance for those who wanted to return to Poland or to emigrate to a third country.

There are no proposals to re-introduce assistance.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The full complement of staff including posts in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office diplomatic wing news department and the aid wing press office for each year from 1979-80 is as follows:

Year	Complement
1979-80	29·0
1980-81	28·0
1981-82	27·0
1982-83	26·0
1983-84	26·0
1984-85	26·0
1985-86	26·5
1986-87	25·5
1987-88	19·0
1988-89	18·0
1989-90	18·0
1990-91	18·0
1991-92	18·0

The number of staff actually employed on 1 April 1990 and 1991 was 18. Figures for staff actually employed on 1 April in the preceding years 1979-80 to 1989-90 are not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Iraq (Refugees)

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest position of insurgents and refugees in the south of Iraq and on the Iran-Iraq border; and what aid Her Majesty's Government has sent and is proposing to send specifically for this area.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 25 April to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn).

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, once the safe havens have been duly established in Iraq and have been in working order for a while, he will arrange for a delegation of hon. Members to visit these sites.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We shall certainly ensure that hon. Members are kept fully informed of progress on the establishment of safe havens for Iraqi refugees and shall consider how this can best be done, if appropriate by including visits to the sites.

Nuclear Suppliers Group

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the purpose of the meeting of the Nuclear Suppliers Group in the Hague on 5 to 7 March; who represented the United Kingdom; when the previous Nuclear Suppliers Group meeting was held; what plans were made for the next Nuclear Suppliers Group meeting; and if he will make a statement on the role of the Nuclear Suppliers Group.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The meeting of states adhering to the Nuclear Suppliers Group guidelines focused on the strengthening of existing nuclear-related export controls and possible expansion of the group. Officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Energy and the Department of Trade and Industry represented the United Kingdom. The last meeting of the full group had been in 1978. The participants in the recent meeting agreed to meet again in the future, but no firm date was set. The role of the group is to draw up and administer guidelines for the control of nuclear-related exports.

Hong Kong

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the annual report on Hong Kong will be laid before Parliament.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The report is being published and laid before Parliament today. Copies will be placed in the Library of the House.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Doncaster Benefits Office

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the overall cost to date of the computerisation of the payment system of benefits to claimants at his Department's offices in the Doncaster area; and what will be the final cost on completion of the system.

Miss Widdecombe: The computerisation of the social security payment system, otherwise known as the operational strategy, is being undertaken on a nationwide basis and it is therefore impracticable to apportion development costs to any one location.

Widowed Parent Allowance

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what would be the annual cost of extending widowed mothers' allowance to widowed fathers where at least one of the children is under five years;

(2) what would be the annual cost of extending widowed mothers' allowance to widowed fathers where at least one of the children is under 11 years.

Miss Widdecombe: It is not possible to estimate accurately the cost of extending the widowed mothers' allowance to widowed fathers for those with children in the specified age groups.

Appeals

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what information he has concerning the delays in weeks between the notification of appeals against the decisions taken by adjudication officers on (a) claims for benefit relating to vibration white finger disability and other manual-occupation inflicted disability and (b) claims for the payment of arrears of reduced earnings allowance, in local DSS offices in Stranraer, Greenock and Port Glasgow, and the hearing of such appeals by social security appeals tribunals and medical appeals tribunals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The question of delay between appeal and hearing involves not only the Department of Social Security but also the office of the president of social security appeal tribunal, which is independent of the Department and falls within the responsibility of the Lord Chancellor. Information as to the time taken to prepare appeals for hearing of specific benefits, by specific local offices is not kept and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Family Credit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 91, how many family credit entitlements of less than 50p a week were decided in 1990; and what would be the cost of (a) paying family credit of less than 50p a week and (b) entitling families with such awards to social fund payments and remission of NHS charges.

Mr. Jack: Information is not readily available for the whole of 1990 as retrieval from records could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Information for the period from August 1990 to date indicates there are about 4,800 claims for family credit a year where the entitlement is less than 50p a week and therefore is not payable.

The cost of paying the assessed entitlement in those cases would be around £30,000 a year. There would also be additional administration costs.

Non-entitlement to family credit does not prevent some further help being given to families. For example, help with NHS charges is also available to anyone on a low income through the NHS low income scheme. People can also apply for crisis loans from the social fund whether or not they are in receipt of family credit, and if they are in receipt of housing benefit or community charge benefit, they can also receive funeral payments. The additional cost of entitling families with family credit awards of less than 50p to maternity and funeral payments from the social fund and to automatic full remission of NHS charges would depend on the extent to which they were already entitled to such benefits and to the extent to which they needed to make use of them. From information available about social fund maternity and funeral payments to existing family credit recipients the extra cost is estimated at around £20,000 a year at 1990-91 levels. Information is not available to enable estimates to be made on the same basis in respect of remission of NHS charges.

Severe Hardship Provision

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list, for the latest available date, the numbers of 16 and 17-year-olds for whom a direction was made enabling income support to be awarded under the severe hardship provision who were (a) living independently and (b) in lodgings.

Mr. Jack: The latest information available, for the four weeks commencing 25 March 1991, shows that 2,240 directions enabling income support to be awarded to young people living independently were made under the severe hardship provision. Of those, 308 were made to those in board and lodging accommodation and 223 to those in hostels, including night shelters.

Appeals

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many appeals were heard by social security appeal tribunals in each month since January 1990; in how many cases no presenting officer appeared; and what information he has regarding the outcome of these appeals compared with those where a presenting officer was present.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested.

Statistics relating to social security appeal tribunal hearings are collated on a quarterly basis. The latest figures available are for the quarter ending 31 March 1990, when there were 17,851 hearings.

No figures are available on the number of cases at which a presenting officer was not present, although it would be exceptional for a presenting officer not to be in attendance.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Salmon Catches

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest provisional figures available to his Department for salmon catches by all methods in United Kingdom waters, and what were the comparable figures for previous years.

Mr. Curry: The provisional catch data for salmon in the United Kingdom during 1990 has recently been estimated at 943·5 tonnes. The components of the catch are calculated as follows:

	Tonnes
England and Wales	297
Scotland	542·5
Northern Ireland	104

All data are provisional since not all catch returns have been received.

Responsibility for the publication of salmon catch data for England and Wales now rests with the National Rivers Authority, which is expected to publish detailed figures for 1989 shortly. Figures for 1989 in Scotland and Northern Ireland are already available.

Data for earlier years in respect of England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, have been published by the fisheries departments, and are available in the Library of the House.

Spray Irrigation

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions his officials have had with the National Farmers Union and Country Landowners Association about the need to ban spray irrigation in certain areas during the coming summer months.

Mr. Curry: Officials have had numerous discussions recently with the National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association and with the National Rivers Authority and other interested organisations. The objective has been to encourage responsible water use in order to avoid, if at all possible, the complete ban on abstraction for spray irrigation which was imposed in some areas in 1990.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. Curry: The information requested for the press office in my Department is as follows:

	Staff-in-post	Complement
1979-80	[1]—	22

Legal System

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons were (a) recruited to the procurator fiscal service in the past year, (b) how many left because of retirement age and (c) how many resigned for other than retirement reasons.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In the year from 1 April 1990 to 31 March 1991 (a) 94 persons were recruited to the procurator fiscal service, (b) eight retired, and (c) 62 resigned. These figures refer to all staff in the procurator fiscal service.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the Crown Office policy on plea bargaining.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: "Plea bargaining" is generally understood to involve an agreement whereby an accused will tender pleas in return for an assurance as to the sentence which will then be imposed by the court. No such arrangements can be made in Scotland and accordingly "plea bargaining" is an inappropriate term in Scotland. The prosecution does retain the right in the public interest to abandon proceedings, amend the charges, or accept a partial plea of guilty, at any stage prior to the final determination of proceedings. This may be done by the prosecutor for a variety of reasons. As with the decision to institute proceedings, it is left to the discretion of advocate deputes or procurators fiscal. In specified circumstances individual prosecutors may be required to consult senior members of the procurator fiscal service, Crown counsel or the law officers before taking such a course.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many criminal trials in the past six months started within 10 days of the legal termination that would have been applied by the 110-day rule.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the percentage of prosecutions when measured against the total number of charges reports submitted to procurators fiscal in each sheriffdom at the latest available full year; and if he will give the comparable figures for each of the last five years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information which is set out in the tables below refers to court proceedings as a percentage of reports submitted to procurators fiscal. The first column details the number of reports received in each year. The subsequent columns detail the disposals for each year, although some of the disposals may relate to reports received in the preceding year.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the annual expenditure in each year since 1979 on renewable energy programmes in or for Scotland; and if he will break down the total sum spent among (a) solar active and passive, (b) photovoltaics, (c) biofuels, (d) wind, (e) tidal, (f) wave, (g) geothermal, (h) hydro power (including small systems,) and (i) others.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend the Secretay of State for Energy administers the Government's programme of expenditure on renewable energy in order to stimulate development for the UK as a whole. The table below gives expenditure within that programme since 1979. There is no specific allocation for Scotland.

Notes:

1. Where available external contributions include both private sector, generating boards and the European Commission.
2. Up to 1986-87 total for RED also includes expenditure on low head hydro and general studies to 1986-87. These are separately identified for 1987-88 and include work carried out by the chief scientist group ETSU.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of renewable energy potentials in Scotland by type of source including (a) solar active and passive, (b) photovoltaics, (c) biofuels, (d) wind, (e) tidal, (f) wave, (g) geothermal, (h) hydro power (including small systems) and (i) others.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The potential for the development of renewable energy in the United Kingdom was described in the Department of Energy Paper No. 55 published by HMSO in 1988 "Renewable Energy in the United Kingdom—The Way Forward". It was estimated on a United Kingdom basis that renewable energy might provide by the year 2025:

Electricity producers	TWh/year
Wind power onshore	0·30
Tidal	0·28
Geothermal HDR7	0·10
Wave	0·0·2
Small-scale hydro	0·3-0·7
Electricity producers	Mtce/year
Passive solar	1-2
Biofuels:
Wet and dry wastes	3-10
Forestry	1-5

Working Hours and Earnings

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will (1) publish figures showing the (a) average earnings, (b) average gross hours and (c) average overtime hours for (i) male, (ii) female and (iii) all workers in full-time employment in each of the Scottish regions and islands area for each year from 1979 to 1990, inclusive;

(2) publish figures showing (a) average earnings, (b) average gross hours and (c) average overtime hours for (i) male, (ii) female and (iii) all workers in full-time employment in Scotland for each year from 1979 to 1990, inclusive.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The available information is given for 1990 in the table below. Since such a large volume of information has been requested, I will write to the hon. Member giving the equivalent information for each year from 1979 to 1989 inclusive. A copy of the letter will be placed in the Library.

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what facilities he has made available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Lang: My Department has not made facilities available to staff to contribute to the appeal. The St. John Ambulance Brigade does not operate Scotland.

Housing

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report each private sector landlord and local authority who has expressed an interest in acquiring the former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in the Border region to date; and when he expects to announce a deadline after which further applications will be too late to be considered.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Expressions of interest in acquiring Scottish Homes housing stock will be registered with that agency, which will then screen them in accordance with the procedures published by Scottish Homes in October 1989. Any proposals acceptable after the initial screening stage will be notified to the tenants and made public by means of a press release. There is no requirement for Scottish Homes to make available the names of those making unsuccessful proposals.

Scottish Homes asked for registration of interest to be submitted to it by 6 April. Applications received after that date will not be considered.

MFV Antares

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any information concerning the date and location of the forthcoming fatal accident inquiry into the deaths of the crew of the MFV Antares; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Investigations are continuing into the deaths of the crew of the MFV Antares. The date and location of the fatal accident inquiry have yet to be fixed.

Child Abuse

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many criminal convictions there have been for offences against children where children were abused by a parent in the Renfrew division of Strathclyde region in the last two years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on the relationship between offenders and their victims is not colleced centrally.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any proposals to reduce delays in court proceedings in child abuse and sexual cases; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Considerable priority is given initially by the prosecution authorities and subsequently by the courts to the speedy handling of cases involving children.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any proposals to introduce in court proceedings concerned with child or sexual cases video recordings of testimony from child witnesses as evidence; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Certain of the recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission in its report on the evidence of children and other potentially vulnerable witnesses were implemented in the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1990. We are considering whether it might be appropriate to bring forward legislative provisions implementing the remaining recommendations of the Commission. These recommendations include the possible taking of the evidence of a child on commission with the proceedings being video recorded for subsequent replay at the trial.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 25 April 1991]: For 1988-89 to 1990-91, the figures were:

	1988-89 £	1989-90 £	1990-91 £
Television advertising	576,000	974,000	741,000
Radio advertising	40,000	85,000	188,000
Newspaper advertising	378,000	1,022,000	613,000
Other promotional material	933,000	1,001,000	1,098,000

For 1979-80 to 1987-88 an analysis in the form requested is not available.

Total expenditure on information publicity was:

1979-80	263,000
1980-81	362,000
1981-82	393,000
1982-83	386,000
1983-84	360,000
1984-85	704,000
1985-86	677,000
1986-87	857,000
1987-88	1,094,000

Provision for expenditure by the Scottish Office on information campaigns in 1991-92 is £2·2 million. The breakdown of expenditure by different media is not available.

The above figures do not include the running costs of the Scottish Office information directorate.

ENERGY

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. Wakeham: The staffing of my Department's press office, including the speech writing unit and the public inquiry point where appropriate, has been as follows:

	Numbers
1991	13
1990	13
1989	13
1988	[1]13
1987	[2]11

[1]at 1 July 1988.
[2]at 1 December 1987

It is not possible to identify separately the staffing of the press office before 1987.

Nuclear Accidents

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what studies have been undertaken by his Department in the five years since the Chernobyl accident to evaluate the long-term costs of a nuclear accident, in the United Kingdom or nearby continential Europe, involving the equivalent energy and radiation release as occured in the Soviet accident.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Since the Chernobyl accident, the approach of the United Kingdom Government and nuclear industry has been to concentrate on ensuring that the high standards of safety employed in the design, construction and operation of United Kingdom nuclear installations are maintained. These standards mean that the likelihood of any accident at a United Kingdom nuclear plant resulting in a significant off-site release of radioactivity is extremely small. The chance of an accident involving a release on the scale of that which occurred at Chernobyl is widely acknowledged as being considerably more remote.

Extensive programmes of research and development funded both by Government and the nuclear industry are being carried out to underpin the maintenance of the United Kingdom's high safety standards.

Despite the extremely low chance of an accident on the scale of Chernobyl at a United Kingdom nuclear installation, the Government have thoroughly reviewed nuclear emergency planning arrangements since the Chernobyl accident. In collaboration with the safety regulatory authorities, the industry, and other bodies involved in emergency planning at both central and local level, a number of improvements have been put in place. These should ensure a continuation of high standards of emergency planning for responding to a nuclear accident. and protecting the public from any consequences.

There is no reason to suppose that the standard of safety adopted in nearby continental Europe are any less rigorous than those applied in the United Kingdom, and international conventions on early notification provide for early warning of events likely to have trans-boundary consequences. The Department of the Environment has developed a national response plan to provide a framework for dealing with any consequences for the United Kingdom of an overseas accident; it includes the establishment of a nationwide network of monitoring stations, the Radioactive Incident Monitoring Network, RIMNET, designed to detect independently any radioactivity arriving in this country.

Chernobyl

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what British nuclear expert assistance has been offered by the Government to the Soviet atomic energy authorities managing the Chernobyl sarcophagus to obviate the threat of radioactive dust pollution.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I understand that the Soviet Union has not requested any assistance from the United Kingdom Government in respect of this matter. Nevertheless, the United Kingdom is prepared to give sympathetic consideration to any such requests.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many scientists from (a) his Department, (b) the nuclear installations inspectorate and (c) the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, respectively, have visited the Chernobyl reactor complex since 1986.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I understand that the information requested is as follows:

(a) no scientists from my Department have visited the Chernobyl reactor complex;
(b) two principal inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate have made such visits;
(c) six scientists from the Atomic Energy Authority have made such visits.

In addition, since the accident, members of both the nuclear installations inspectorate and the Atomic Energy Authority have made visits to the Soviet Union to further collaboration on various aspects of nuclear safety. The United Kingdom has also participated in discussions held under the auspices of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Advanced Nuclear Fuels (Uranium Shipment)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the outcome of the investigation by EURATOM into the mistaken shipment by Advanced Nuclear Fuels of Lingen, Germany, of 130 kg of enriched uranium to the United States of America; and what assessment has been made of the implications for the application of EURATOM nuclear safeguards in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is not for the United Kingdom Government to comment on such matters. EURATOM safeguards will continue to apply to all civil nuclear material in the United Kingdom.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 189

SESSION 1990–91

15th April—26th April 1991

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.
